NIXON IS REPORTED TO SAY KISSINGER CHOSE WIRETAPS

Associates of Ex-President Say His Testimony Seems to Contradict Secretary

By NICHOLAS M. HORROCK
Special to The New York Times
LOS ANGELES, Jan. 17—Richard M. Nixon testified in a closed session at San Clemente that he never personally selected the persons to be wiretapped under an operation of the Federal Bureau of Investigation in 1969 to find the sources of leaks of information, associates of the former President said today.

These associates said that in seven and a half hours of being questioned by Morton H. Halperin and lawyers for the American Civil Liberties Union, Mr. Nixon staunchly defended his decision to use wiretapping to find the Government officials who were allegedly leaking national security information to the press. He reportedly said he had left the selection of the targets up to Henry A. Kissinger, then his assistant for national security affairs.

His testimony, these sources said, appears to contradict a sworn statement by Mr. Kissinger, now Secretary of State, made public earlier this week. Mr. Kissinger said, in the statement about the same case, he recalled having a meeting with J. Edgar Hoover, then director of the F.B.I., and John N. Mitchell, then Attorney General, on April 25, 1969—a meeting at which Nixon specifically directed the electronic surveillance of four persons whose names had been suggested by Mr. Hoover.

Order on Halperin Denied
Mr. Nixon, these sources said, did not criticize Mr. Kissinger during the interrogation Thursday in San Clemente, but he did say that Mr. Kissinger had been "in full accord" with the use of wiretaps to find news leaks and was instructed to select the targets for wiretapping. Mr. Nixon said that he did not order a tap to be placed on the phone of Mr. Halperin or any of three other persons tapped on May 9, 1969. Moreover, according to these sources, Mr. Nixon said he believed it was up to Mr. Kissinger to halt a given wiretap if it were unproductive.

In the period from May 9, 1969, to Feb. 16, 1971, the F.B.I. placed wiretaps for varying lengths of time on the telephones of 17 persons, including four newsmen, White House aides and a Pentagon official, these sources said. Many of the welfare experts, who were interviewed recently, are reconciled to Congressional inertia this year on reform of what is universally referred to as the country's "welfare mess," an issue that usually generates election-year rhetoric and promptings for change from the existing Federal welfare system.

Col. Samuel Chiwale, army chief of Angola's National Union, is greeted by youngsters in the town of Bukaco. His troops are fighting the Soviet-backed Popular Movement.

WELFARE REFORMS NEAR A STANDSTILL

Most Experts Feel Election Year Is No Time to Push for Major Federal Plan

By WILLIAM F. FARRELL
Special to The New York Times
WASHINGTON, Jan. 17—A number of the nation's leading welfare experts have reversed their previous positions and, at least for the foreseeable future, are shying away from pushing proposals to replace the current unwieldy array of Federal welfare programs with a single omnibus program for aiding millions of America's poor.

Included in this number are some of the designers of President Nixon's ill-fated omnibus Family Assistance Plan, which perished in the United States Senate in October, 1972, after more than three years of planning, politicking, hearings and debate. At that time, a large number of Republicans and Democrats agreed that some form of a guaranteed annual income was preferable to the existing Federal welfare system.

Cubans' Flights for Angola Fuel at Azores Despite Ban

From the Azores last night that after a discontinuation, Cuban aircraft were once again stopping to refuel at the island of Santa Maria. The Cuban planes reportedly land at night and even ground personnel on the island are not permitted to board them.

Portugal has officially adopted a position of neutrality toward the warring factions in its former West African colony and has declared that it would not permit its Atlantic islands to be used as a transit point for war materials to Angola. Nevertheless, sectors of the Portuguese Government, led by the Foreign Minister, Maj. Ernesto Melo Antunes, openly favor the Liberation of Angola, which is supported by Cuba and the Soviet Union. It is believed for that reason, some authorities there shut their eyes to the Cuban stop-overs in the Azores.

Italy's Reds Build Power By Tactics of Moderation

By ALVIN SHUSTER
Special to The New York Times
ROME, Jan. 17—The Communist Party, preaching its own brand of moderation and responsibility, is making new inroads into the political and social life of Italy and improving its chances of emerging as the country's largest party.

Time appears on the side of the Italian Communists and many diplomats and others agree that even the present political crisis here could work to their advantage. The standing of the non-Communist parties, led by the dominant Christian Democrats, seem to decline with each crisis and this one, arising from the resignation of the Cabinet, is no exception. In bringing down the Government last week, the Socialist Party confirmed what most Italians believed—that the Communists were playing an increasing role in shaping domestic policies. The Socialists, feeling squeezed out, withdrew their support of the Government because, in effect, they saw the Christian Democrats drawing closer to the Communists out of necessity and relying more on them in quiet dealings in Parliament.

Time for Sharing
"The Communists should benefit from the present troubles," said one non-Communist member of Parliament. "They can stand back and say that nothing works, that no combination of the other parties can hold together and that now is the time to let them share power."

Chicago Teamsters Gain in Power Shift

NEW CEASE-FIRE SOUGHT IN BEIRUT AS WAR SHARPENS

Palestinians and Lebanese Leftists Continue Assault on a Christian Town

150 REPORTED KILLED

Capital Is Largely Isolated With Communications Cut and the Airport Closed

By JAMES M. MARSHAM
Special to The New York Times

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Jan. 17—Leftist and Palestinian gunmen dressed their offensive against the Christian town of Damur today, apparently taking sections of the city, and Prime Minister Rashid Karami worked desperately to find the basis for another cease-fire in Lebanon's nine-month-old conflict.

Beirut remained largely cut off from the outside world, its airport closed, its tele and overseas telephone lines down and its highways unsafe. In countrywide fighting, some accounts said that more than 150 people had been killed in the last 24 hours.

After two Lebanese Air Force jets attacked leftist and Palestinian positions around Damur yesterday, in defiance of Mr. Karami's orders, fighting broke out late in the night around Beirut's airport, which is guarded by the army. A postmidnight cease-fire between the Palestinian-leftist coalition and the army failed to hold. The clashes at the airport appeared to have been touched off by gunmen in the Moslem village of Quzai, which lies between the airfield and the Mediterranean, who reportedly opened fire on the two jets as they swept low over Beirut on the way back to their base in the Bekaa Valley.

Gunmen Fired on Jets
Several mortar rounds landed near the airstrip, forcing the closing of the airport, and today an uneasy truce prevailed between soldiers holding positions in the sand dunes above Quzai and the nearby village of Khadde.

The charred bulk of an army armored personnel carrier, flames licking its interior, badly damaged jeeps emblazoned with leftist letterings and three private cars, their windows shattered by gunfire, littered the main north-south coast highway that runs through Quzai.

Gunmen carrying a variety of weapons, Kalashnikov assault rifles, grenade launchers and pistols, moved warily about the town under the surveillance of a fortified army position, which included several anti-aircraft guns and a tank.

A helicopter swooped low over the highway strip and the Land-Rover halted, then stopped. A gunpost did not stop civilian cars which whisked by swiftly but when an unarmed Land-Rover belonging to the leftist Nasserite Corrective Movement tried to pass the army post opened fire and shattered the vehicle's windshield.

to Act on '76 Nominees Tomorrow

By W. APPLE JR.
Special to The New York Times
IOWA, Jan. 17—A convoluted process of choosing the final nominees—a squiring, logistics, intelligence worthy of a small out to begin here Monday night with Iowa's 2,530 pre-empted, tens of thousands, conventions, meetings and primaries, later, with the final delegates as on June 26.

More State Primaries
Since 1972, when reform rules radically altered the nominating process, further changes have been introduced, both in national party rules and in state laws and regulations. More states that ever before, for one thing, have decided to hold primaries, including, for the first time, all of the 10 largest states. Four years ago, two-thirds of the delegates were chosen in primaries; this year, nearly three-quarters will be, with primaries of various descriptions, scheduled in 30 states.

The most important of the new primaries is that in Texas on May 1. But more important than any single addition is the length of the list and its random arrangement, which forced difficult strategic decisions and punishing schedules on the candidates. Efforts to group primaries on the same date by region met with only limited success. For example, New Hampshire votes on Feb. 24 and Massachusetts on Feb. 25.

ols in State Foresee Labor Strife in '76

By HAROLD FAREK
Special to The New York Times
Jan. 17—Schools in 16 States have just entered the worst year in labor terms of labor this year promises worse, according to reports here.

Contract negotiations in many labor relations, are the following: 1. 360, or 73 percent of contracts that were struck that 1975.

And 1976 will be worse. "And 1976 will be worse," added Thomas Y. Hobar, president of the New York State United Teachers, a federation that covers almost all the teachers in the state, including those in New York City.

Mr. Hobar's gloomy prediction was repeated in a series of interviews here with other school labor officials. They cited various reasons, including inflation, a rise in the cost of living, a declining enrollment that triggered a demand for staff reductions and uncertainty about the amount of state aid for local schools. They also cited a larger number than usual of teacher contracts being up for renewal this year.

Yale Students to Have Their 'F's' Recorded Again

Special to The New York Times
NEW HAVEN, Jan. 17—A four-year-old effort to blot their academic records, Yale University undergraduates next fall will again have failing grades put into their transcripts for flunked courses. Joining a trend toward grade inflation at many schools across the country, the Yale faculty has voted to restore the "F" to undergraduate transcripts as a means of assessing the quality of these students' academic records.

The transcripts are used by the admissions officers of graduate and professional schools to evaluate candidates and the Yale faculty has concluded that a fuller record will benefit students applying to highly competitive postgraduate schools. Since 1975, failing grades have been given to students who deserved them about 1 percent of the grades each term at Yale are "F's" but the marks have been left out of the transcripts to encourage students to take courses outside their major fields without fear of damaging their academic records.

U.N. Half-Listens to a Half-Debate on the Mideast

By KATHLEEN TELTSCH
Special to The New York Times

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y., Jan. 17—In the Security Council hall the third Arab speaker of the day was exploring the roots of the Palestinian case against Israel, denouncing the 1917 Balfour Declaration pledging British support for a Jewish national homeland in Palestine.

The Soviet delegate, Yakov A. MALIK, his eyes closed, gave every appearance of napping. The British representative chewed a pencil. Albert W. Sherer Jr., sitting in the United States' place for the ailing Daniel P. Moynihan, rocked gently and tied his desk by industriously rolling scraps of paper into balls.

With Israel boycotting the debate on the Middle East, the diplomats are finding the special session a curious exercise. "It is like a boxing match with one adversary missing," said one bored diplomat outside the meeting room. He feigned a punch and said: "Hit the phantom."

"It is undramatic so far," acknowledged Basel A. Aql, a representative of the Palestine Liberation Organization. But that is because everyone is waiting for the speech of the United States—now expected on Monday afternoon. After the crowds of diplomats on opening day, the ranks have dwindled. There are few black Africans following, the debate, and even fewer Latin Americans.

Mr. Moynihan believed the attention was slackening off because the action had shifted elsewhere, mainly to the delegation offices away from the United Nations where the Arab representatives were trying to reconcile their differences on the drafting of a resolution for the Council.

Arab Observer's View

"The last caucus was a very good one, insisted Amin Hilmy 2d, the observer of the League of Arab States who was host at a meeting on Friday. "All that remains to be added is some seasoning and spice," he said. "Are they concocting one text or two resolutions?" he was asked, and he answered, "It is not decided yet," which suggested that the results are not ready for the table.

Chaim Herzog, Israel's chief delegate, had been absent from the proceedings because of the participation of the Palestine Liberation Organization, but he had been calling on Council members to present to them his Government's case.

In making his rounds, Mr. Herzog said, he discovered that many diplomats were unfamiliar with the P.L.O. 1964 covenant that expressed the organization's political aims—aims, he has charged, that seek Israel's liquidation as a state. At his initiative the Israeli delegation has translated the covenant into English and had it circulated at the United Nations.

Shafik al-Hout, the P.L.O. spokesman, said that the Israeli version in English was inaccurate—"more of the big lie." The P.L.O. will renounce the stated covenant aims, he added, when the Israelis renounced their territorial ambitions. He charged that the Israelis sought to control all lands from the Nile to the Euphrates.

Because of the bomb discovered near the United Nations on Monday and a score of telephone taps since then, the public has been excluded for the duration of the debate and only a handful of invited guests occupy seats in the gallery. One day Mrs. Kurt Waldheim escorted Mrs.

Nelson Rockefeller. Mrs. Olaf Rydbeck, the wife of the Swedish representative turned up for three meetings and sat listening, crocheting busily turning out a coverlet.

At the side of the Council chamber seats are reserved alphabetically for interested delegation members who want to watch the proceedings. A member of the Israeli delegation turned up and quietly took his seat. Another moved to the place beside him reserved for Italy. The small act of occupation went unopposed. There are plenty of seats.

Frequently the restless delegates slip away to the lounge for coffee, iced drinks and talk.

Lisbon's Non-Communist Parties Resist A Proposal for Continued Military Rule

Special to The New York Times
 LISBON, Jan. 18—A military proposal for continued rule by the armed forces until 1980 was opposed today by Portugal's three main non-Communist political parties.

The ruling military Council of the Revolution will begin negotiations with the five principal parties next week on its proposal, which is reported to concentrate political power in the council. The council submitted its proposal to the parties Tuesday as a counterproposal to one presented by the parties in late December for a new pact to replace the one signed by the military and the parties last April.

The April pact gave essential power to the military for three to five years, but it has been under attack by the non-Communist parties as well as by military leaders who favor a return to civilian rule.

Communist Approval

Only the Communist party and its ally, the Popular Democratic Movement, appear to have approved the military council's counterproposal.

Jorge Miranda, of the Popular Democratic Party, expressed the major objection of the non-Communist parties in an interview in Lisbon's leading morning newspaper, Diário de Notícias. The new proposal would give the military even more power than it has under the present pact, he said, pointing out that the proposal would require the council's approval for the appointment of the prime minister.

Francisco Sa Carneiro, leader of the Popular Democrats, the second largest party, insisted on a return to civilian rule as he spoke at a rally at the town of Bombarral, north of here. He stressed that negotiations on the original pact should not be delayed.

The proposal under debate was drafted by five members of the Council of Revolution led by Foreign Minister Ernesto Melo Antunes. Major Melo Antunes has made it clear that he believes the military should retain a central role in politics "to guarantee the revolution" that began with the bloodless coup of April 25, 1974.

A group known as the "operational" military, which is now said to have a majority in the Council of the Revolution, was expected to be strongly critical of the Melo Antunes proposal, which favors the position of the military "politicians." The proposal was leaked to the press at the end of the week, although it had been agreed to keep it secret.

Source's in the three non-Communist parties expressed surprise over the Melo Antunes proposal, which they said virtually ignored their own proposals. Practically the only concession to the parties was a provision that the president of the republic be elected by universal suffrage rather than by an electoral college including the military leadership, as is provided by the original pact.

Parties' Proposal Ignored

Mr. Miranda, the Popular Democrat, agreed that the military body should have veto power over matters of national defense and military service, but he insisted that it should not be able to veto other matters.

The proposed text would give the council the right of veto over legislation involving economic, financial and social policy, the limits of state, collective and private property, foreign relations and the regulation of political associations, as well as the organization of national defense.

The Council of the Revolution would also assume the role of the legislative bodies if they consistently rejected its recommendations.

It is also specified in the text that the council would be responsible for regulating its own organization, composition and functioning.

REMEMBER THE NEEDLES!

On Friday, leftists defied a government ban by staging a protest against high prices. It was the first demonstration in Lisbon since last November.

Lebanon, Jan. 17—Yasser Arafat said this week that he expected to begin negotiations with the United States on the issue of a change in official U.S. attitudes toward the guerrilla leader. But the leader indicated that he would not use its veto in the United Nations Security Council to block the Middle East peace process.

Mr. Arafat, who spoke in English after having previously written out in Arabic the answers to questions submitted to him on Jan. 5, accused the United States Central Intelligence Agency of "participating in a conspiracy against Lebanon" in collaboration with what he termed "international Zionism and international imperialism."

assault rifles slung over their shoulders.

Mr. Arafat, who spoke in English after having previously written out in Arabic the answers to questions submitted to him on Jan. 5, accused the United States Central Intelligence Agency of "participating in a conspiracy against Lebanon" in collaboration with what he termed "international Zionism and international imperialism."

Lebanese Partition Opposed

He asserted that the aim of this "conspiracy" was to partition Lebanon into Moslem and Christian states.

"They are planning what has been done in Cyprus," said the guerrilla leader, wearing as always his black and white checkered kaffiyeh. "We are against it because it is a conspiracy against our Arab nation. We are not willing to have another Israel in our Arab nation."

On the issue of official American attitudes toward the Palestinian question, Mr. Arafat said, "There is no real change. All that we can say is that there is the beginning of a verbal, not practical, change in the position of some American personalities who are beginning to see that the Palestine question is the key to the Middle East crisis."

"The Saunders document is part of this beginning, no more," said Mr. Arafat in response to a question about Nov. 12 testimony in Congress by Harold H. Saunders, who was then Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for New Eastern and South Asian Affairs.

"The issue is not whether Palestinian interests should be expressed in a final settlement, but how," Mr. Saunders said.

Effort to influence P.L.O. When a visitor mentioned that some analysts believed the Saunders document represented an attempt to draw the P.L.O. into the diplomatic process and make it more "moderate," Mr. Arafat smiled and said, "Do you think I have to open my cards? I am not the first to open my cards."

and gives Israel all kinds of sophisticated armaments and money.

In a written reply to a question about American public opinion on the Palestinian question, Mr. Arafat asserted that the American people had opposed "the adventures of previous Administrations in Vietnam, because it was they who were paying the price in the same way that the ordinary American now pays with his taxes the price of Zionist blackmail."

"When the American people understand the roots of the Palestinian question," he added, "they will be more friendly to our just cause because justice is on our side—and we are asking for peace and not war and aggression."

Mr. Arafat asserted that the Israeli Government was increasing "its intransigence and madness" and was "living in a dream world."

"They still deny the Palestinian people their right to exist," he said.

The guerrilla leader declined to be drawn into a discussion of what position the P.L.O. might take if Israel recognized it, but instead cited a number of hostile statements about the organization by high-ranking Israeli officials.

"Let us watch and see how our affairs develop with this Zionist-fascist mentality first," said Mr. Arafat.

The stated goal of the Palestine Liberation Organization is to build, in the place of Israel and the occupied West Bank of the Jordan River and the Gaza Strip, a secular and democratic state to which the Palestinian refugees would return.

Palestinian leaders have made it clear that they would accept, as a nominally interim step, the creation of a West Bank-Gaza state, but none has said that the P.L.O. would recognize the state of Israel.

CANADA PRESSING FOR TV REVENUES

Special to The New York Times
 OTTAWA, Jan. 17—Canadian television authorities have agreed to listen to any alternatives that the United States may propose to replace the controversial Canadian practice of deleting commercials from American programs relayed to Canada by cable.

Canada, however, remains determined to take all steps necessary to insure that American advertising aimed at Canada is diverted from the American channels to Canadian broadcasters, an official of the Canadian Radio Television Commission, the domestic regulating body for the industry, said after meeting with United States officials this week.

Pending further meetings, expected to begin soon, "commercial deletion continues to be the policy," a Canadian spokesman stated. The commission, which controls the licensing of broadcasting, has ordered cable companies to work out schedules for the deletions. Some are already in partial effect in Toronto and Calgary.

Israel Seeking New U.S. Hawkeye Radar Planes to Bolster Missile Defenses and Air-Attack Accur

By DREW MIDDLETON
 The acquisition by Israel of four advanced radar surveillance aircraft from the United States approved by Congress will augment Israeli air superiority over any combination of Arab air forces, according to United States and Israeli officials.

The Defense Department announced recently its intention to sell Israel four Grumman E-2C Hawkeye planes. These early warning and command aircraft have been in service with the Navy since late 1974. Congress approves the deal, it will be the first sale abroad of these highly sophisticated aircraft.

The planes are expected to be used over the Sinai desert to monitor the interim peace agreement with Egypt. In war they would direct the main air superiority force of 25 F-15 Eagles that Israel is buying from the United States.

According to aerospace industry sources, the price for the four Hawkeyes will be approximately $182 million. This will include all support equipment, spares, engine maintenance pilot training and incidents.

Israel expects to receive its first F-15's in 1977 and the first of the E-2 C's the following year. While the two aircraft would represent an advanced air combat team, Israeli Air Force officers apparently see the Hawkeye as a sentinel that would warn of Arab troop and armor concentrations before an attack could start.

The Hawkeye, according to Israel sources, is also able to detect missile launchings and is of particular usefulness in early warning systems against ground-to-ground missiles. It could probably also guide Israeli missiles and drones over and into enemy territory.

Possession of Hawkeyes, American Naval officers said, should do much to relieve Israeli fears about the threat posed by Soviet-supplied missiles in the Egyptian, Syrian and possibly Iraqi forces.

Hawkeyes are already in service on aircraft carriers of the Sixth Fleet in the Mediterranean where naval officers say they have added a new dimension to the monitoring of Soviet ships at sea and aircraft ashore.

According to one officer the radar installations on a Hawkeye "can detect and track several hundred targets.

At 30,000 feet, the aircraft's radar can reach out more than 200 miles to detect an airborne target as small as a few square yards. Its twin turboprops allow exceptionally short runway operations and long missions.

Grumman, the makers, contend that the E-2C can fly from unimproved runways and that in addition to providing early warning of enemy attack, the Hawkeye can function as an airborne command and control station.

According to a Navy source, the strategic influence of the advent of the Hawkeye in the Middle East cannot be exaggerated.

The Israeli Defense Ministry, Pentagon officials say, is pushing for earlier F-15 deliveries. The Pentagon, they said, has offered Israel approximately 10 of the air-superiority fighters that have been used in the Air Force's test program and then reconditioned for operational use.

Israelis say that F-15's are needed to balance the advanced Soviet fighters in Arab air forces. They estimate that there are 120 to 140 MIG-23's the most advanced general purpose fighter in the Soviet Air Force, with the Syrian, Egyptian, Iraqi and Libyan air forces. There are also a number of MIG-25 F-16 fighter bombers. Some of these fly over Israel.

The Pentagon also is to consider Defense Secretary Shimon Peres's request to be authorized to F-16 fighter bombers. Some of these fly over Israel.

FIGHTING PERSISTS ON OMAN'S BORDER

Although Sultan Reported End of Uprising, a Visitor Finds Shooting in Dhofar

ERIC PACE
Special to The New York Times

MAD LIMA, Oman, Jan. 14—Soviet and Western weapons are being pitted against each other in a small war in this remote corner of the Arabian Peninsula.

Sultan Said bin Qabus announced last month that his forces had crushed and ended a 10-year-old rebellion here in Dhofar Province adjoining Southern Yemen, which supports the rebels.

Since then, Southern Yemeni aid guns, made in the Soviet Union, have continued to fire across the border at Omani Army outposts, and last week insurgents began lobbing mortar rounds at Omani troops from positions a mile or so on this side of the frontier.

With the rebellion mostly extinguished elsewhere the 35-year-old Sultan is eager to make his might felt in the ravines and craggy hills between the border and a hilltop helicopter pad and command post here, nine miles to the east.

Aircraft Attack Rebels

Oman's British-run air force has been hitting back at the northmen on this side of the border, British officers report. Today, a British-made Strike-master fighter-bomber fired a salvo of 12 Sura rockets at a suspected mortar position.

The target of the rebel shelling and mortar fire was a stone and sandbag outpost called Capstan, on a bottle four miles west of here, which was hidden by white clouds blowing off the Arabian Sea two miles to the south.

Capstan is one of a score of border outposts manned by Omani troops to prevent rebel leaders and the army of Southern Yemen from sending in men and equipment to bolster the uprising by the Jabali tribesmen in Dhofar. The rebels have killed more than 400 people, according to Omani army estimates.

The conflict has caused strain in the Arab world because it reflects the hostility between conservative Arab governments like that of the Sultan of Oman, and radical Arab leaderships like that in Southern Yemen. The involvement of outside powers adds to the strain.

Soviet Provides Weapons

The Soviet Union has been providing arms to the rebels as well as to Southern Yemen, the Sultan's officers say, and the 12,000-man Omani Army has been reinforced by 3,500 Iranian troops as well as more than 500 British mercenaries—more politely known here as contract personnel—and career British servicemen on temporary duty.

Nonetheless, the hostilities are limited. The Southern Yemeni bombardment, which is almost a daily event does not begin until about 9 A.M.

"Nowadays they don't start until they've scratched themselves and had a wash," said Maj. Andrew Swindale, a 29-year-old Sandhurst graduate.

All told, about 3,000 enemy shells, rockets and mortar rounds have been fired at Omani targets in the last six weeks without causing any casualties, according to Omani Army officers.

"We're just maintaining the presence," said Lieut. Col. Jonathan Salubury, Treasury, a Cold Stream Guards officer on "loan" to Oman. He commands the area around Dhahat, a recently recaptured coastal settlement 12 miles or so east of the border.

The turban-clad Colonel towered over a sly Jabali militia man named Saleem from the Bahi Herdan clan, who leaned on his Belgian-made 7.62-mm. rifle, the Omani Army's basic weapon, and chirped happily. "There are no more enemy here."

In interviews this week they said the Omani Army had not fired back across the border recently so as to make it possible for Southern Yemen to stop the shelling some day without losing face.

The Soviet-made AK-47 is widely preferred by Jabali tribesmen, who praise its light weight and large cartridge magazine.

Over the years, conflicts here in southern Arabia have been made bloodier by a vast variety of imported weapons.

Today the arms circulating here include West German rifles taken by the rebels from Iranian troops who have suffered relatively heavy casualties.

The flow of modern Western armaments into Oman is financed by an outlay of roughly $500 million a year on the Omani armed forces and the police.

The Sultan has bought United States-designed Agusta helicopters made in Italy as well as quantities of United States-made wire-guided antivehic missiles.

These missiles would be useful in the unlikely event of a strike by Southern Yemen's Soviet-made armor into the stony desert north of here. The Omani Army had been planning to try them out against rebels who hid out in caves. But most of the rebels fled into Southern Yemen late last year before the tow could be used.

MANY LANDS SET NEWS CURBS IN '75

Press in India Hurt the Most by Censorship—Reds Fix Southeast Asia Limits

By The Associated Press
The free flow of news suffered its most serious setback last year in India, where the Government imposed rigid censorship on the domestic press and foreign correspondents for the first time since independence in 1947.

Elsewhere in the world, press freedoms suffered from Communist take-overs in Southeast Asia and from the demise of the Portuguese empire in Africa.

The death of Franco in Spain gave rise to hopes for easing Western Europe's only formal press censorship.

The Helsinki Declaration signed by 35 nations last August promised a freer flow of information between the Soviet bloc and the West, but by the end of the year there was little progress.

Severe Restrictions in India

In India, censorship guidelines introduced when Prime Minister Indira Gandhi proclaimed a national emergency June 26 were harsher than those that countries normally impose in wartime. These prohibit any effective reporting of anti-Government news in general and anything that censors feel could denigrate the Prime Minister personally.

The Indian press reluctantly accepted censorship rather than risk closure of publications. Foreign dispatches were exempt from precensorship from July, although correspondents were still expected to censor their own dispatches according to the Government guidelines.

Nevertheless, foreign news media continued to try to report the news from India. The Government retaliated by expelling six foreign correspondents of The Associated Press, The Washington Post, The Los Angeles Times, Newsweek and The Times and The Daily Telegraph of London.

The Government also periodically severed foreign correspondents' communication lines and their telephones to punish them for self-censorship violations.

Controls Tightened

The Government on Dec. 8 tightened its controls further, promulgating executive decrees that removed immunities on coverage of Parliament and barred the publishing of any closure of publications.

Nations signing the non-binding Helsinki agreement pledged, among other things, to improve the working conditions and increase opportunities for journalists in their respective countries, and "encourage" the distribution of newspapers, books and periodicals between countries.

The Soviet Union issued multiple entry visas and loosened restrictions on foreign journalists traveling in the Moscow area. But it said it would continue to decide what information was "truthful," thereby leaving strict government censorship at the source, although there is no formal censorship of outgoing dispatches.

Reporters Under Surveillance
Correspondents are frequently followed by the police when they contact dissidents or Jewish activists, and telephone tapping is common.

Foreign correspondents in Eastern Europe, however, were generally subject to less harassment than in the Soviet Union.

In Western Europe, with a new regime in Spain, hopes for an easing of press censorship have increased, but it may be some time before a clear pattern is established. The Government runs television and radio news, so control of information to the nation's biggest audience will presumably continue.

In Greece, censorship was abolished following the end of dictatorship in July 1974, but the civilian Government now is expressing concern over what it says are frequent inaccurate stories that result from fierce competition among Athens newspapers.

Britain's Press Uneasy

In Britain, financial difficulties and moves by Prime Minister Harold Wilson's Labor Government and its trade-union allies brought a sense of unease to Britain's news industry. With all of Britain's national papers in financial trouble, the possibility of Government aid threatened the independence of the press and its traditional role as society's watchdog.

Mr. Wilson's Government failed in an attempt to prevent publication in The Sunday Times of excerpts from the diaries of a former Cabinet minister, Richard Crossman, who died in 1974. The diaries conflicted with Prime Minister Wilson's published memoirs and with official Cabinet records.

Elsewhere, South Korea was under strict self-censorship following a May 13 emergency decree of President Chung Hee Park that banned publication of reports of anti-Government activities. Foreign correspondents were subject to the decree, but no action was taken.

New Australian Leader Starts Quietly

Special to The New York Times
 SYDNEY, Australia, Jan. 17—Malcolm Fraser has made few headlines during his first months as Prime Minister of Australia, showing a pace and style significantly different from that of his predecessor, Gough Whitlam, whose early days in office were marked by a spectacular series of Government initiatives.

When Mr. Whitlam became Prime Minister in December 1972 after the first election victory of the Labor Party in 22 years, he formed a two-man Cabinet, consisting of himself and Deputy Prime Minister Lance H. Barnard, with the aim of quickly fulfilling the party's major election pledges. Within days the new government had recognized China, ended Australia's involvement in Vietnam and begun wooing Australia's Asian neighbors. On the home front it set in motion major changes in the fields of health, education and social welfare.

On Dec. 13 the Labor government was defeated as the coalition of Liberal and National Country Parties under Mr. Fraser won majorities in the House of Representatives and the Senate.

No Dramatic Announcements.
 Mr. Fraser announced his Cabinet a few days after his election victory, but it did not meet until this week. The meeting produced no dramatic announcements, and decisions on a number of questions were deferred.

Mr. Fraser, however, is quietly turning Australia away from the course set by his predecessor. In contrast with the policies of Labor, which sought to concentrate more power in the federal government, the Fraser administration is discussing new taxation procedures with the states that will give them more financial autonomy.

The Fraser administration has reversed a trend toward expanding the federal bureaucracy by disbanding a number of departments set up by the former government. It has promised to retain Medibank, the national health scheme introduced by the Labor government, but has ordered an inquiry into its operation with a view to reducing its costs.

In foreign affairs, Mr. Fraser and Defense Minister Denis James Killen have indicated a greater willingness to cooperate with the United States on defense matters.

Mr. Killen has welcomed American development of the Diego Garcia Island base in the Indian Ocean and said that the Australian base under construction at Cockburn Sound in western Australia would be available to American Navy ships, probably including nuclear-powered vessels.

The Labor government was marked by a flamboyance that is missing from the present administration. When Mr. Whitlam expanded his Cabinet to include 27 members, it spoke with several voices. Mr. Fraser has so far managed to impose a strict discipline on his Cabinet, so that all major pronouncements come from his office.

is Seek to Reduce a Multiplicity of Political Parties for Election Campaigns

VID A. ANDELMAN to The New York Times
KOK, Thailand, Jan. 17
 ad's numerous political have begun the ring for the two-election campaign determine the stability democratic government.
 Mr. Kukrit said he elections would lead to a government with fewer competing parties and less internal bickering.

 Several of the parties have already begun to discuss anti-gamation as a means of reducing to more manageable proportions the more than 40 parties that stood in the elections a year ago. Twenty-two of these elected members of the House of Representatives, Monday and the King and eight were included in the coalition.
 The largest party, the Democratic Party led by Mr. Kukrit's older brother, Seni Pramoi, and the farmer-oriented Social Agrarian Party have reportedly reached agreement on coordination of their campaigns although merger is doubtful. The two leading military-based parties—the Chart Thai and Social Justice Parties—are understood to be prepared to cooperate.

 But without a Constitutional amendment restricting the number of parties, it is unlikely that any real cooperation will be possible.
 "It's beginning to look like France under Mendes-France," said one Western diplomat. "At this rate we'll be lucky if there's a new government only once a year. And believe me, here in Thailand these days,

 there are many more forces of instability than France ever knew in the pre-de Gaulle era."
Forces Are Restrained
 These forces of instability, principally the students, labor and the farmers, who apart from the chaos within the political parties were responsible for the fall of the government, were remarkably restrained during this first week of the caretaker administration.
 "We do not want to cause disturbances, we did not want to bring the government down," said Paisal Thawatchai, president of the Federation of Labor Unions, in an interview last week. "We want only to help the worker—keep down the price of rice so he could eat."

 The National Students Center plans to hold fortnightly rallies to "monitor the progress and the cleanliness of the election campaign and the government," as one sponsor put it.
 The first rally yesterday attracted fewer than a thousand people, a crowd that in Bangkok can be assembled to watch an auto accident.

 The only potentially ominous note was yesterday's announcement by the former supreme commander, Gen. Kris Sivara, that he would not seek a seat in Parliament.
 Military observers said this could mean that the military was staying on the sidelines to retain the freedom to step in if the next government did not work out.

 campaign recently revived here against "decadent and reactionary" culture.
 The first in a series of lectures on journalists' roles in the new society, was delivered by Tran Bach Dang, who is generally regarded as South Vietnam's propaganda and news chief. He is also a founder-member of the National Liberation Front.

Mr. Tran told an audience of 300 journalists that they had three vital tasks: to faithfully reflect the socialist view point, to increase its circulation and become the link between the masses and the government and to personally stoke up revolutionary ardor and strengthen their own political judgment.
 The culture campaign was directed earlier mainly at universities, but now it seems to be intended for the press publishing, and the entertainment industry.
 South Vietnamese journalist are not, in principle, subject to censorship, but publications are officially obliged to follow government instruction.

Indian Press Controls, Designed to Halt Rumors, Seem to Foster More Rumors

By WILLIAM BORDERS
Special to The New York Times
NEW DELHI, Jan. 15—A midnight telephone caller passes along news of a protest march, a rumor that turns out to be false.

A chance comment at a diplomatic reception, another rumor, leads to the disclosure that a former cabinet minister has in fact been arrested.

Rumors in today's India, with all the regular information media now controlled by the Government, the rumor has become a conversational staple, especially in this gossipy capital city.

Prime Minister Indira Gandhi says that one of the reasons for the censorship that her Government imposed last June was to end the spread of "vicious rumors."

"The papers were printing all manner of falsehoods and hearsay," the Prime Minister has said repeatedly.

But some Indians think that rumors have an even more central role now than they had before the strict new political order was imposed.

There are rumors about the Government; several different plans are circulating that purport to describe how the Indian Constitution will soon be amended to give Prime Minister Gandhi greater power.

And there are rumors about the opposition—about demonstrations, protest strikes and underground meetings.

"Nobody knows anything; it's all rumor and hearsay," complained M. C. Chagla, a former cabinet minister and ambassador who is now in the opposition. Describing the case of a New Delhi man who was held for seven weeks under the emergency, Mr. Chagla said: "Nobody knows that he was ever arrested, nobody knows that he was released, and nobody knows what judgment was delivered. If you want to read the judgment, you will have to go to the London Times.

But The Times of London, like Time, Newsweek and the other foreign publications still circulating here, is likely to be blocked at the airport if it contains any unfavorable news about events in India.

Indians accustomed to following public affairs closely now share the complaint of a Bombay housewife who asked sadly, "How are we supposed to have any idea what is really happening?"

A traveler will be questioned closely about what he has seen and heard in other parts of India; and even a government

East Germans Set Growth Rate Of 7% a Year for Their Industry

Special to The New York Times
EAST BERLIN, Jan. 17—The East German Communist Party newspaper has published a blueprint for the country's new five-year plan calling for an industrial growth rate of 7 percent a year between now and 1980, and an increase in productivity of about the same amount.

The economic draft is to be presented at the ninth party congress in May along with a party program and revised policy statutes from which all references to German reunification have been dropped. The documents envisage further political, military and economic integration into the Soviet bloc, but normalized relations with West Germany are also stressed.

Neus Deutschland, the party paper, printed the lengthy texts over three days, and said the contents were open for discussion by party members and the public.

On Worker Productivity
In the economic plan, the East Germans were told the party has "highest expectations" for increased output by individual workers. Productivity of all workers in industry is expected to rise 30 to 32 percent in the five-year period, the program says.

At the same time, industrial production is to increase by 34 to 36 percent until 1980 and the gross national product is to rise 27 to 30 percent. This means a yearly increase in industrial production of about 7 percent.

The texts renewed pledges of stable consumer prices, which East Germany has said it will maintain at present levels despite inflation in the cost of raw materials and other imports.

By putting a ceiling on the cost of living, the Communists expect to avoid general discontent. "You cannot tell people to work harder and then go ahead and let the prices rise," an East Berlin party official said.

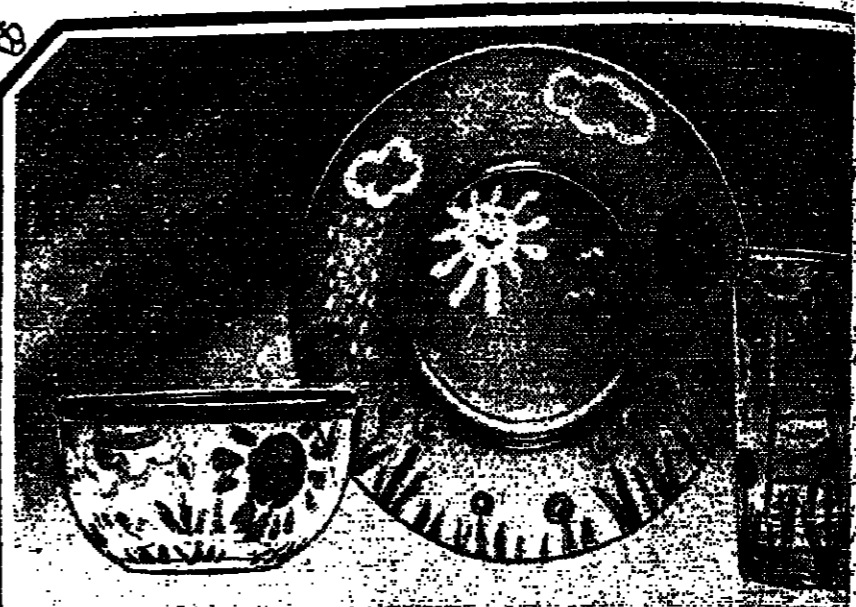

Economy Is Emphasized

The five-year plan specifically calls for "intensification" of industrial production and demands "strict economy in the use of raw materials" to overcome the difficulties of rising price rates. "Only by increasing our achievements can we make those means flow that we need to raise the standard of living and to modernize our industry," the text states.

Consumers were told they could expect more and better industrial goods. By 1980, the plan says, 750,000 additional housing units will have been provided, some by modernizing existing structures but most of them through new construction.

In the revised party statutes, the Communists removed a clause that said by building socialism, the East German party was "helping the two German states towards a happy future in a united Germany of peace, democracy and socialism." The new version mentions as the party's highest aspiration the deepening of the "unbreakable friendship" and the "brotherly alliance" with the Soviet Union.

Diahann Carroll speaks out on Fashion Fair (let's listen in)

The cheers Fashion Fair's been receiving from the women who use it have made this the absolutely top line of cosmetics and treatments for black women today. One of Fashion Fair's most glamorous, and famous, cheer leaders is Diahann Carroll, a beauty who knows a lot about makeup. When asked about Fashion Fair's Perfect Finish Ms. Carroll said: "... it's a new concept in creme makeup. It not only gives you a great base, it covers midnight circles, won't streak, and will never turn ashy. Besides all this, it's a super way to do a touch-up without starting all over."

Once you learn the philosophy behind Fashion Fair you'll see why this whole beautiful collection is such a success.

"For years", said Eunice Johnson, Fashion Director of Ebony Magazine, "we tried everything--matching, mixing, patching, stirring up colors that looked right with our models and all the new fashions. Finally we decided that if there was no such thing as a prestigious cosmetic for black women--we'd make it."

You'll find Fashion Fair at Altman's naturally. And here's what's gloriously fair about it. The colors are perfectly toned to go with the vast range of black complexions, and that's true of every beauty aid. The products don't turn red or go gray (as Diahann Carroll said), they don't streak or shine, stay "set" and smooth.

We've listed just a few of the Fashion Fair preparations. But be fair to yourself. See our entire, elegant collection and take advantage of a chat with our Fashion Fair Makeup Consultants.

to discuss the Azores problem, according to the state radio. In a telephone interview with the Portuguese radio, Mr. Ferreira declined to comment on his talk with the President, but said that "we cannot let Santa Maria be used for help to one of the movements in Angola."

He admitted there were Cuban flights, but said there was no airlift.

Meanwhile the Ministry of Cooperation, which handles affairs with the former colonies, reported today that a new wave of refugees were trying to flee the fighting in Angola.

Six thousand were said to have gathered at the airport of Sa da Bandeira, in the south, waiting to be evacuated. They were said to have fled fighting between the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola and the National Front for the Liberation of Angola.

These two groups, supported by the West, were also said to be fighting in the region of Mocamedes, a southern Angolan fishing port, forcing some three thousand people to flee in fishing boats to Walvis Bay, South-West Africa.

South Africa Bars Docking
But the boats were kept waiting offshore. The Government of South Africa, which controls the territory of South-West Africa, announced that only bona fide Portuguese among the refugees—half were black Angolans—would be allowed ashore, and then only on condition that they agreed to be flown to Portugal. South-West Africa lies between Angola and South Africa.

Several thousand Portuguese have fled to Zaire to escape the fighting in northern Angola between the National Front and the Popular Movement, according to the report from the Ministry of Cooperation.

Portugal is planning a new airlift to get refugees out, a ministry spokesman said. He specified that the airlift would begin Thursday with a daily jumbo-jet flight from Kinshasa, capital of Zaire.

In the Portuguese airlift from Angola last year, a total of 235,315 refugees were brought out between May 1 and Oct. 31, with the help of American and other foreign aircraft.

The Angolan Fighting
LUSAKA, Zambia, Jan. 17 (UPI) — Soviet-equipped forces were reported close to victory today in their drive to capture a key stronghold of rival forces in central Angola.

Pro-Western military sources said the troops of the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola, backed by Cuban soldiers and Soviet weapons, were on the brink of capturing the town of Cela.

The sources said Cuban troops were bearing the brunt of the battle for the town, a former supply base for some 1,000 South African troops fighting the Popular Movement. About 7,500 Cuban soldiers are fighting alongside the Popular Movement's troops.

The National Union for the Total Independence of Angola, which is Western-supported, said it had captured the strategic town of Quibala, inflicting heavy losses on the opposing force. Quibala, 50 miles north of Cela, is on the road to the Cambambe hydroelectric dam, which supplies most of the power for Luanda, the Popular Movement's capital.

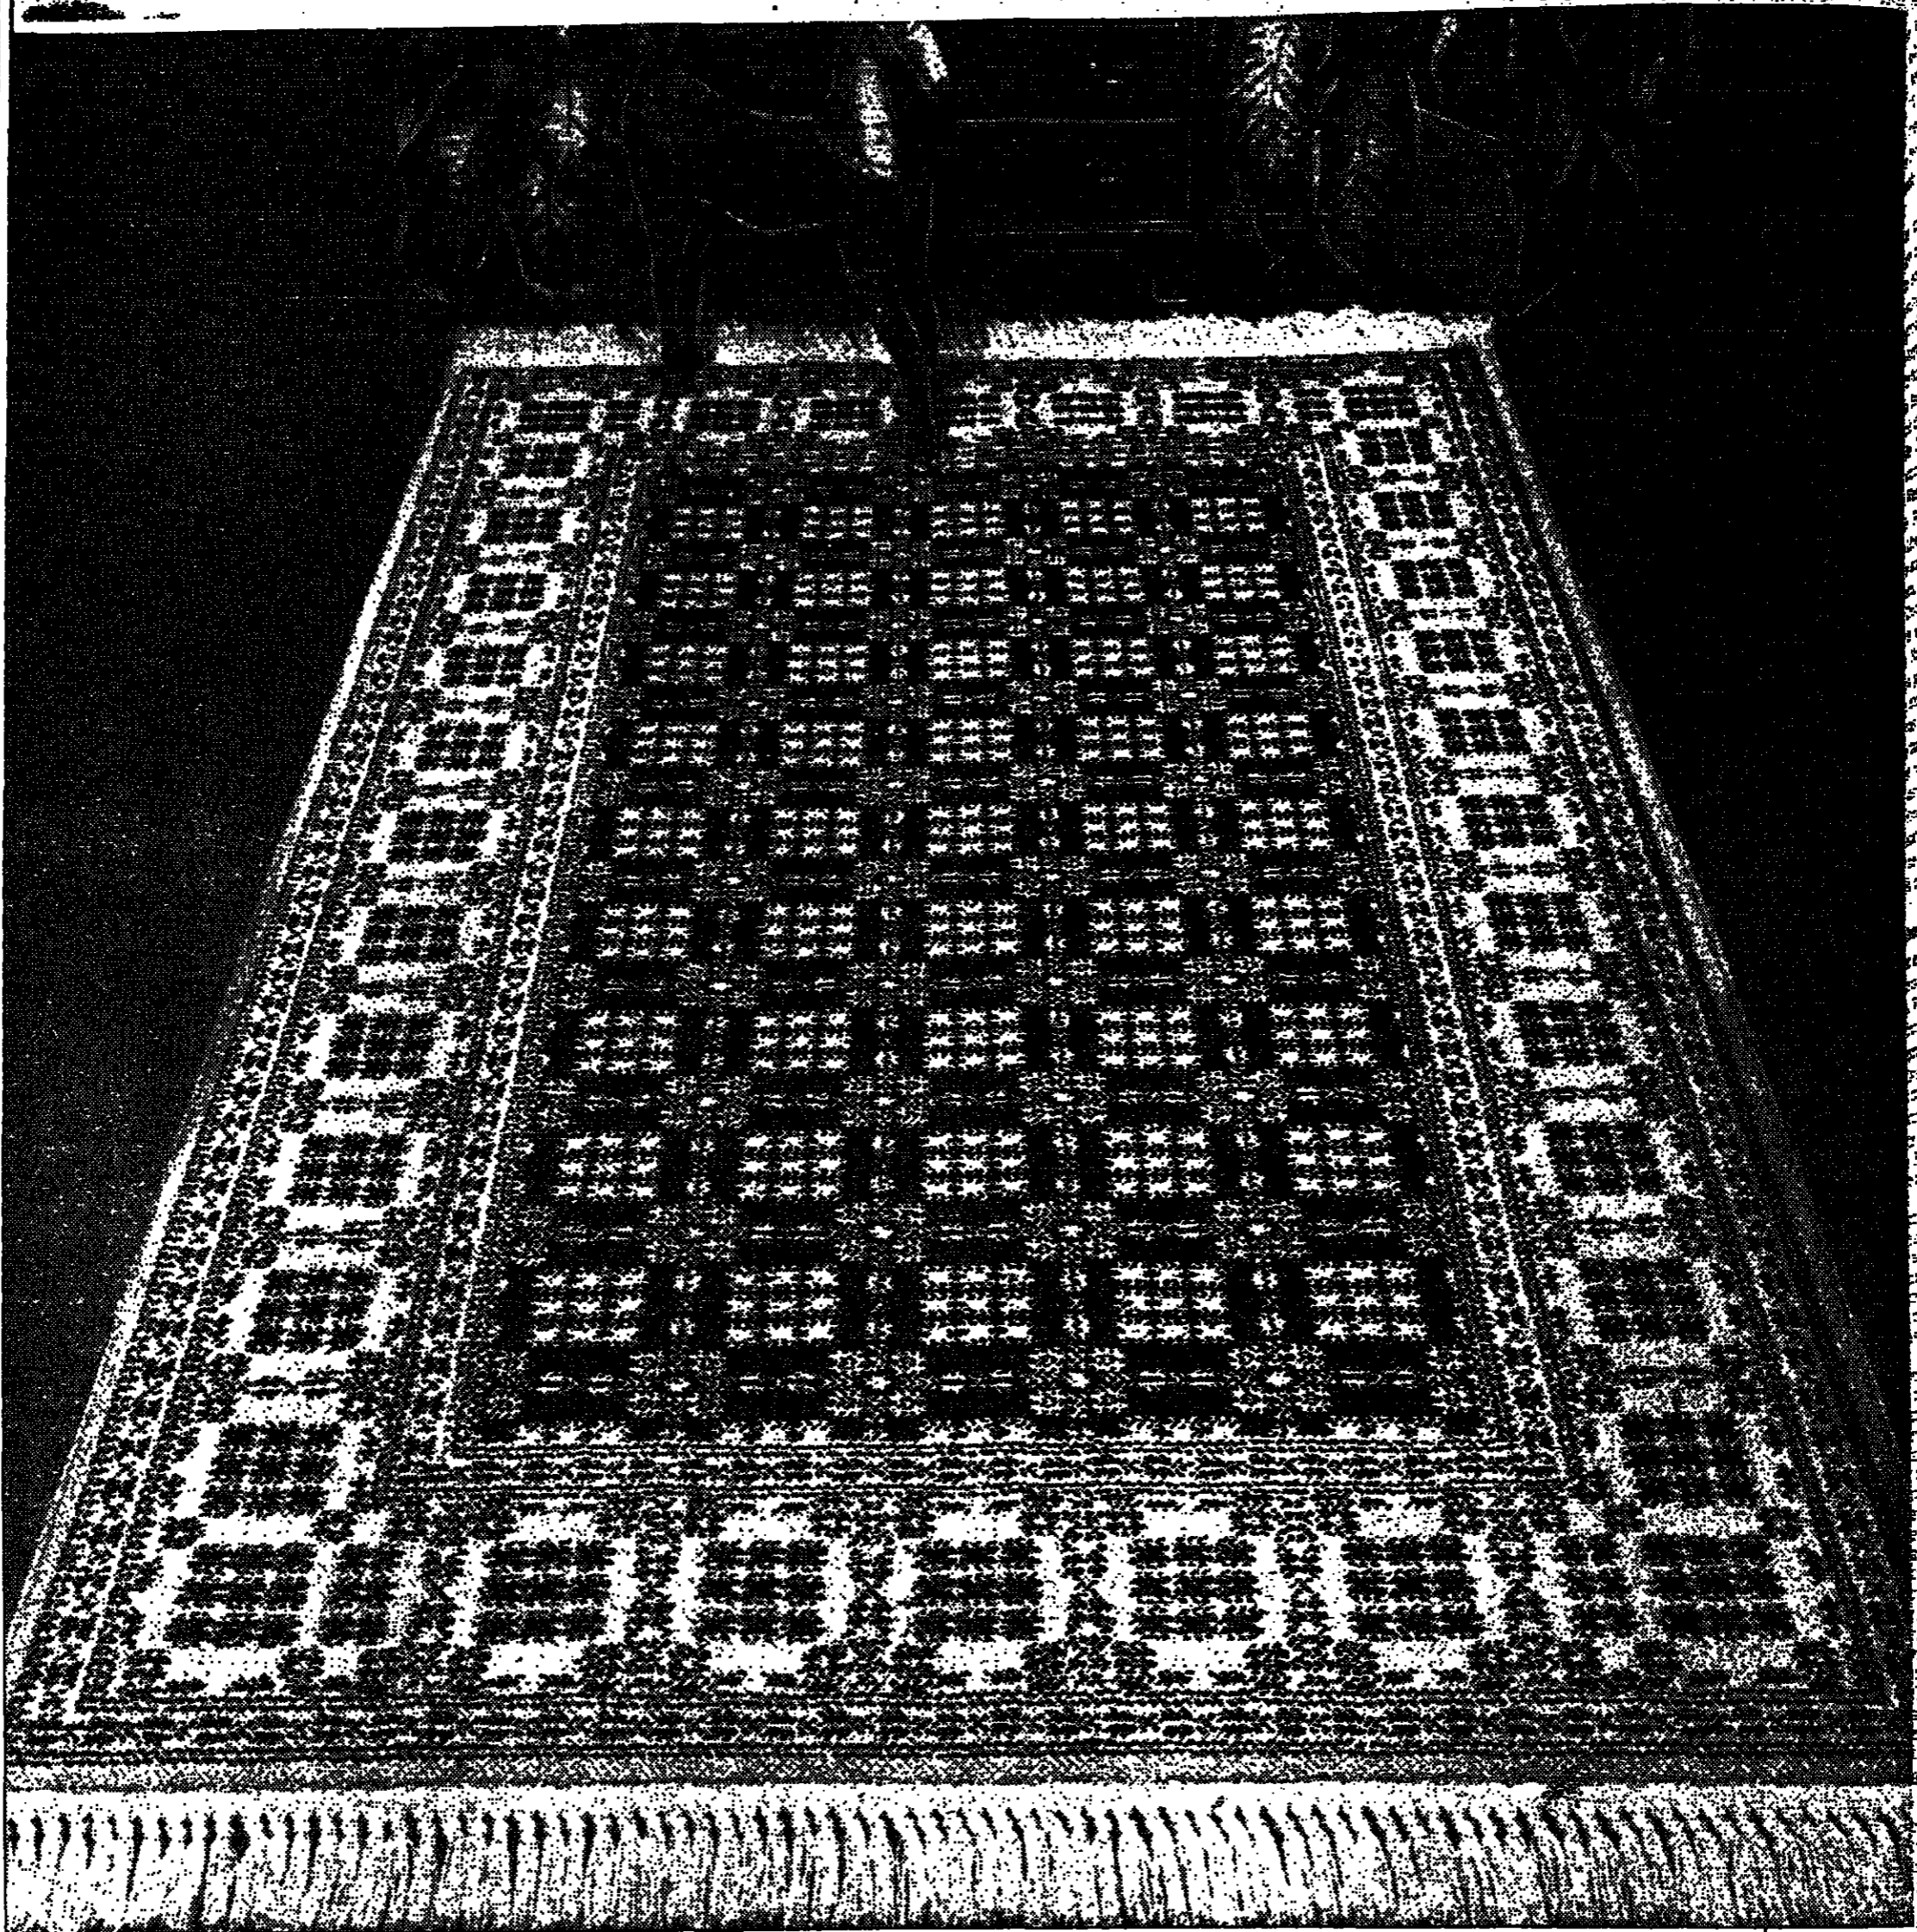

On the eastern front National Union forces, supported by South African heavy artillery, reportedly repulsed a Popular Movement assault on the railway town of Luso.

Luso, straddles the Benguela railroad, a vital copper-export route for neighboring Zaire and Zambia.

The battle situation in northern Angola was unclear. The Popular Movement said it had pushed the forces of the National Union's ally, the National Front for the Liberation of Angola, to the Zairian border.

1,000 Here March Against a U.S. Role In War in Angola

In a spirited demonstration marked by chanting and colored banners, 1,000 people marched yesterday in protest against United States intervention in Angola.

Distributing leaflets and newspapers along the way, the protesters marched from Herald Square crosstown to Eighth Avenue and down to 14th Street and beyond.

"We don't want to wait until this becomes another Vietnam," said Andy Stapp, a member of Youth Against War and Fascism, a socialist group that organized the march.

As the protesters squeezed 10 abreast down the street, Saturday shoppers shuffled in to store entrances. Some congratulated the demonstrators, some refused their literature and others said they did not understand the protest.

"Getting out of Angola is good," said Blanche Slavin, who watched the marches pass in front of her apartment house at 28 Street and Eighth Avenue. "I'm against any war. We should keep the money here where we need it."

"I don't give a damn who runs Angola," said a well-dressed man waiting for his wife outside Macy's.

One woman who refused to give her name outside the General Post Office at Eighth Avenue shouted at the marchers, "You're all a bunch of Communists."

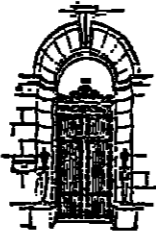

Despite the large mass of marchers and the Saturday crowds, the demonstration was orderly.

Prosecution Called Futile In California Racial Clash

TAFT, Calif., Jan. 17 (UPI)—It would probably be futile to attempt to prosecute persons responsible for racial violence in this community last Memorial Day weekend, a state attorney general's report has concluded.

Thirteen black students at Taft College had to flee the town following clashes with gangs of young whites and could not return to finish the semester.

The report released yesterday said evidence indicated the blacks had been attacked with out provocation and the whites, who had been drinking, were the aggressors at all times. The attacks reportedly were precipitated by blacks' dating white girls.

In ruling out prosecution, the report said it would be difficult to obtain evidence because witnesses had dispersed.

Italy's Communists Building Power With Steady Tactics of Moderation

ry A. Kissinger and other Western officials despite the party's declaration of support for continued membership of Italy in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Mr. Kissinger's efforts and the recently revealed plans for new secret spending by the Central Intelligence Agency here are all designed to bolster the non-Communist forces and to stave off the surging Communists. In the view of Mr. Kissinger, the presence of Communists in the Italian Government would threaten the future of the alliance and weaken Western Europe.

Emblem of the Communist party of Italy.

As of now, the Communists are doing quite well in Italy. Their strength and influence as Italy's second largest and best organized party are far greater than generally realized outside and their voices are heard even by those politicians who profess they do not listen.

Control of the North
They control all the major cities north of Rome, including Turin, Milan, Bologna, Genoa, Florence and Venice. These are Communist or Communist-Socialist administrations in five of Italy's 20 regions and in 42 of its 94 provinces. The result is that they locally govern about 48 percent of the population.

Even Christian Democrats, who have dominated politics here since the end of World War II, say privately that it would be impossible to operate without the cooperation of the Communist Party. They still rule out, however, any agreement on Communist demands for the "historical compromise," which means seats in a coalition cabinet of Christian Democrats, Socialists and other non-Communist parties.

"It has reached the point where the Christian Democrats cannot agree to govern with the Communists but cannot govern without them either," said one experienced diplomat. The leader of the Communists in Parliament, Mario Pochetti, agreed that their views were crucial in pushing through most important laws. But Communist officials insisted that there was nothing new in this, that their deputies were merely acting as a responsible opposition in a democratic society.

Image of Responsibility
It is this image of responsibility that has helped the party grow. For, by most calculations, the Communists have the power to cripple the economy, block all major bills, bring the country to a stop and wreak general chaos.

The Communists use crises, such as the present one, in which the search goes on for a new government, to underscore their moderation. They keep their supporters in the powerful trade unions calm and they say there is no need now for elections because time would be lost in pressing ahead with needed economic and other measures.

They attack the Socialists for having withdrawn parliamentary support for the governing Christian Democrats and Republicans. Then they make a new pitch for the "compromise" that would give them cabinet seats, too.

In the minds of many voters, the substance of declared specific policies by the major parties is secondary to the desire for change, for social justice, for more efficient and less corrupt bureaucracy, for improvements in housing, health, education and the economy.

The Communists, whose slogans include "we have our hands," have won votes by pointing to their efficient local administrations, by stressing the need for "better management" of Italy's resources and by other themes.

All such rhetoric coupled with increasing public disillusionment in the Christian Democrats and with social and economic tensions, have served the Communists well. In the regional and local elections last June, one of every three voters backed the party and it came within 2 percentage points of overtaking the Christian Democrats as Italy's largest.

In local elections this spring, they are expected to do well again, perhaps winning control of the municipal government of Rome itself, a prospect that particularly dismays the Vatican.

Early Elections Possible
If Aldo Moro, the outgoing Prime Minister now charged with trying to form a new government fails, national elections would follow this spring, or summer. Whenever they are held, the Communists could emerge even stronger and in a position to reinforce demands that the Christian Democrats allow them into the cabinet.

As matters now stand in Italy, cabinet seats are just about all the Communists lack these days. Their strength on the local levels, in regions and cities, and in other areas, is substantial and growing. Their influence on the national scene is also rising, though still limited in the fields of foreign affairs and defense.

The Government decides on a new economic package so what happens? said one diplomat. "Tito La Malfa, the Deputy Prime Minister, calls Luciano Barca, the Communist Party's economic expert, and fills him in. The Communists then make a few suggestions. It's all kind of an unhistorical compromise."

In committee work in the Chamber of Deputies, where the Communists hold 179 of the 630 seats, they also play a vital and quiet role. They joined with the Christian Democrats in an open coalition on a limited abortion bill, angering other political parties that wanted a more liberal law.

Paper Has Great Impact

The Communist newspaper, L'Unita, the third largest in circulation, makes a major impact. The books it criticizes become the books people talk about. The issues it raises are those widely discussed. The decisions it praises are often those many applaud. Most newspapers and magazines veer to the left, including those most respected.

"It's all rather vulgar to be anti-Communist these days," said a university professor. "It's all become so fashionable, even among those in the middle classes, who drive nice cars, live in pleasant homes, those we sometimes call Gucci Communists."

There are signs that the Communists are picking up middle-class support, adding to their strength among the workers and the young. In universities, according to several professors, it is not a question of whether a student is a Communist but whether he is further left, in the extremist fringes that argue the party is too bourgeois.

All this, however, is not to suggest that the party is without its problems or without dangers ahead. It is well aware, for example, that many are looking closely at the administrations in the cities taken over since the June elections to see whether the Communists can make things work in a country where almost nothing ever seems to operate smoothly, except, perhaps, for waiters.

Moscow Link a Problem
There are also problems for the party in its continuing links to Moscow, despite its insistence on autonomy. And there is the worry among many Italians that once the Communists gain power, or a share of power, they won't give it up.

This, too, deeply worries Mr. Kissinger. In his view, the presence of Communists in the Italian Government would threaten the future of the Alliance and weaken Western Europe. He also believes, despite the pronouncements of the party here, that a member of an anti-Communist alliance forced to defend its members against the Soviet Union cannot share power with Communists ideologically linked to Moscow.

Enrico Berlinguer, the 53-year-old Sardinian and former criminal lawyer who directs the party machine, and his aides, have often stressed how independent the party is of Moscow, how it condemned the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia, how it criticized the Portuguese Communists for "revolutionary" attempts to seize power and how it is holding out for guarantees of autonomy.

"Our relationship with all other Communist parties is based on friendship, but we are not tied by the policies of Communist countries," Mr. Berlinguer said recently. "We do not see the Soviet Union as a guide, no Communist Party, not even the Soviet party, has a position of guiding influence."

Still, there are the questions often asked. Are all the leaders and all the rank and file willing to follow the democratic road, yield power if defeated in elections and generally maintain a moderate line? Or, will a radical wing emerge, overthrowing Mr. Berlinguer and those who agree with him?

No one, of course, knows the answer to those questions. At Communist Party headquarters in downtown Rome, they say that the rank and file is behind the Berlinguer policy, and that it recognizes the fruits of moderation in the success of the party so far.

The reasons for Communist caution in approach here are varied. They realize, for example, that a coalition with the Christian Democrats, rather than a take-over by themselves, would create the least turbulence in Italy and ease the shock when they do assume power.

As the Communists see it, a gradual move toward the reins of power would not touch off the kind of panic that could lead to Italy's collapse economically. But many diplomats and Italian businessmen believe that even a coalition government would be enough to stifle investment, frighten off foreign business, endanger chances for needed economic loans and credits and scare away the tourists.

For the present, there seems to be little chance of eroding the support the Communists now enjoy, with or without C.I.A. money. This week, for example, a senior Christian Democrat leaned back after a long discussion of the Communists and said:

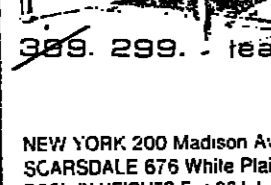

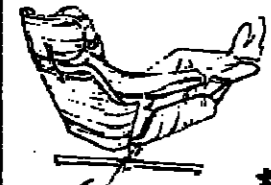

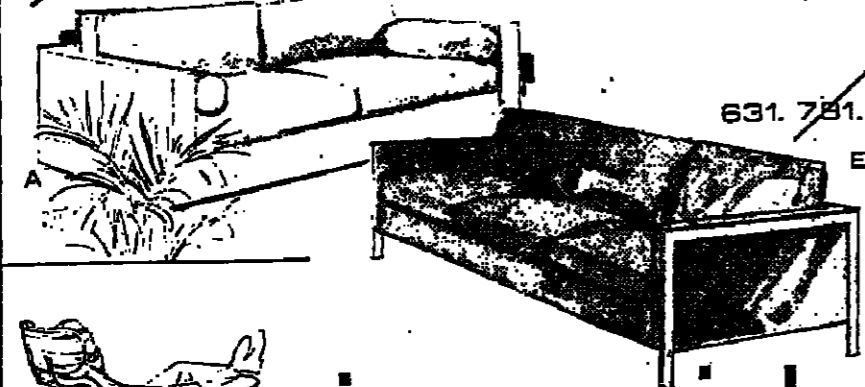

"It seems to me the problem is how to absorb the Communists in coming years, not how to keep them out."

Enrico Berlinguer, party secretary, leaving, Palace on Tuesday after talks on the Govern-

SPAIN'S POLICE FREE 76 HELD IN STRIKES

MADRID, Jan. 17 (Reuters)—Seventy-six worker representatives were released from security headquarters here today when the police dropped charges that they were organizing a general strike movement in Madrid.

A police spokesman said the others of a group of 140 arrested on Thursday night were still being questioned about possible political aims behind labor unrest in Spain.

The disputes in the capital centered on striking bank workers who have joined engineers and construction workers in stoppages for pay increases.

For the second consecutive day, riot policemen evicted employees of four major banks in central Madrid who were holding strike meetings in the main banking halls.

More than 1,000 clerks subsequently occupied a nearby church to continue their meet-

Crushing in Argentina for Good Grain Harvest

By JUAN de ONIS
Special to The New York Times

BUENOS AIRES, Jan. 17—As much as possible and replant the pampas, Argentina's grain harvest, has dealt a heavy blow to the country's economy this year that is expected to pay off heavy losses. The crop has been hit by a combination of factors, including a late start to the growing season, a lack of rain in the key provinces of Santa Fe, Cordoba and Tucuman, and a major factor in pushing up domestic prices, which soared 335 percent last year.

More Tightening Seen
A bumper harvest would have eased the foreign-exchange problem. But the present outlook for crop production indicates more belt-tightening and higher international costs, despite foreign loans of about $550 million that Argentina was able to obtain last year to cope with its foreign-debt burden of about $9 billion.

Farmers had increased crop acreage nearly 10 percent this year because of the crisis facing Argentine cattle exports. Since the virtual closing of the European Common Market to Argentine beef in late 1974, the volume of exports has dropped from 800,000 tons of meat exports annually to about 350,000 tons last year.

Mr. Reca, the Agriculture Secretary, said that Argentine exports could get back to 400,000 tons this year if Europe relaxed its restrictions and improved its exchange rate to stimulate exporters to seek new markets.

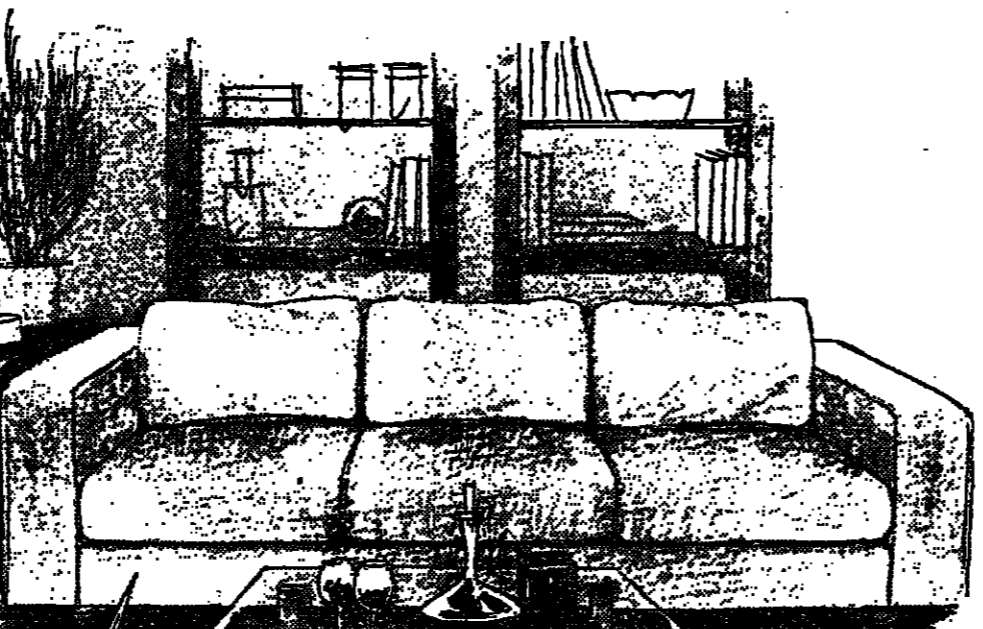

Cattle prices plummeted early last year, and full-grown steers were selling for the equivalent of $30 for an 850-pound animal until August, when prices began to improve. They have since risen about 50 percent, and meat exports have grown from a monthly average of 17,000 tons to about 30,000 tons.

Researcher Finds Longevity Is Linked To Lifetime Habits

MADISON, Wis., Jan. 17 (AP) —Based on studies of more than 2,000 Americans who lived longer than average, a University of Wisconsin researcher concludes that growing old is no accident. It can be done, and done gracefully, if there is moderation, a willingness to adjust and an interest in the future, Dr. Robert Samp of the university's medical school faculty has concluded. Dr. Samp, 50 years old, who has worked for 19 years to learn why some persons live longer than others, finds no evidence that life expectancy is based on genetic factors or on behavior extremes. "Lifetime Habits" "I don't think people are just blessed with long life," he said. "It's a result of lifetime habits. There is a definite personality type among these oldsters." "We find a lifetime history of middle-of-the-road moderation, serenity, interest in others and interest in the future." Based on computer calculations of responses to 118 different studies on aging, Dr. Samp has produced a list of 25 "things that look to be instrumental in continuing or shortening life."

Among them are the following: "Smoke within reason, keep drinking to social occasions, and use it as a relaxant rather than a crutch." "Sleep is essential for survival, and the older you get the more you will need." "Don't fight your enemies, outlive them." "Seek reasons to be happy instead of counting the eternal damnations that beset you." And, Dr. Samp said, "Be smart enough to get out of the rain and keep active."

Traffic Deaths Decline ALBANY, Jan. 17 (AP) —Traffic deaths in New York State dropped in November for the eighth straight month, the Department of Motor Vehicles reported yesterday.

GROUPS DISAGREE ON HOUSING PLAN

City Proposal to Shift Funds Is Praised and Criticized

By GLENN FOWLER

A city plan to re-allocate $12.5 million in Federal funds for Community Development was praised and criticized by neighborhood groups at a public hearing last week.

The city proposes to shift money previously allocated for acquisition of land and run-down housing, placing it instead into rehabilitation, maintenance and emergency-repair programs. The reasoning is that because the city's fiscal crisis has dried up funds that were expected to be available for new construction and for large-scale renewal, the Community Development grants can now better be spent for preserving existing housing stock.

At stake is one-eighth of the Federal aid for the first year—actually a nine-month period—under the Housing and Community Development Act of 1974. The city was allocated $102 million for the period from last June 16 to next March 15. An application for an almost equal sum is being prepared for the second program year and its priorities also reflect the changes that are being proposed for the first-year grant.

Several Object

Federal money under the Community Development program is expected to total $825 million in a six-year period. The grants lump together several categories of Federal aid that was previously doled out separately, including Urban Renewal, Model Cities, water and sewer grants and loans for rehabilitation of housing and of public facilities.

At last Tuesday's hearing before the Board of Estimate, which must make a final determination on the reallocation of first-year money, representatives of several neighborhood organizations in Manhattan, the Bronx and Brooklyn objected that housing improvements for which they had striven for years would now be cast adrift for lack of funds.

Elimination of the entire $6.8 million of Community Development money originally set aside for site acquisition was recommended by a mayoral steering committee headed by Deputy Mayor Paul Gibson Jr.

Starr Reads Letter

The City Planning Commission, after a public hearing last month, modified the proposal so that $1 million would be made available to buy properties in any project area in which financing from other sources, such as Federal Housing Administration Mortgage Insurance, might be forthcoming to develop the site.

Roger Starr, the city's Housing and Development Administrator, opposed this acquisition fund, however, arguing in a letter read to the Board of Estimate that the sum would be inadequate to make any meaningful purchases and would raise false hopes among neighborhood residents. Moreover, he said, it would "tie up a million dollars that could otherwise be used on real programs" that are needed.

One of the efforts to which Community Development money would be diverted is the Emergency Repair Program, under which the city restores services, principally heat, when landlords fail to make necessary repairs.

Computer Link Urged

Representative Edward I. Koch, a Democrat, speaking for the four-member Manhattan delegation in Congress, endorsed the Planning Commission's intention to raise the Community Development contribution to the program from $1.5 million to $2.9 million. He urged that part of the money be used to provide a computer link between the city's Office of Code Enforcement and the Housing Courts in each of the five boroughs.

At a cost $17,000 a year for each borough, he said, the courts, dealing with landlord-tenant complaints, would have instant access to the history of every property with respect to housing-code violations.

The link would facilitate collection of money from landlords for emergency repairs, thus making it possible to extend the program without further outlays of public money, he added.

Robert Schur, executive director of the Association of Neighborhood Housing Developers, suggested that emergency-repair funds could be stretched by contracting the work out to community housing organizations.

Because these nonprofit groups have a vital interest in preserving housing in their neighborhoods, he said, the program could respond to all immediately dangerous conditions, including cascading leaks, falling plaster, defective electrical wiring, leaking gas lines, rodent infestation and accumulation of refuse, as well as to lack of heat and hot water.

He suggested that the groups also be made responsible for collecting payments from landlords who are delinquent in making repairs.

Inmate Committee Presents Prisoner Grievances at Green Haven

Special to The New York Times
STORMVILLE, N.Y., Jan. 9—Three prisoners and two guards sat at a table in a large meeting room in Green Haven prison. Facing them sat another prisoner, Frank Lott, wearing a green state-issue jacket and pants and a black knit cap.

Mr. Lott was there to voice a complaint. He contended that some officers were locking prisoners in their cells for breaking rules and forcing them to wait days for a hearing.

One of the officers at the table, Joseph Lisa, leaned forward with interest. "I used to run a cellblock myself," he said. "There were times I had to lock somebody in and didn't know why."

After many questions and considerable discussion, the inmates and officers agreed to submit to the prison administration a proposal that all prisoners be notified in writing within 24 hours of being charged with an infraction and be given a prompt hearing. Mr. Lott said he was satisfied.

Hundreds of Cases Settled

This inmate grievance committee, composed of prisoners and guards, has settled hundreds of such complaints since its inception at the Green Haven Correctional Facility in October. The program will be instituted in each of the 26 state prisons on Feb. 5.

The State Legislature, in last year's session, passed an amendment to the correction law calling for the establishment of grievance committees in each facility. Green Haven was chosen as a test prison and planning started in May under the leadership of George Nicolau of the Institute for Mediation and Conflict Resolution in New York, two representatives from the Center for Correctional Justice and three inmates elected from one of the prison's cellblocks.

Guidelines were formed with the participation of inmate representatives from the total population. The prison superintendent selected four officers to serve on the committee, and a general election was held in October to complete the inmate representation.

The grievance committee consists of two inmate and two staff representatives, each with alternates, and a rotating chairman who alternates between an inmate and an officer. Three grievance clerks record grievances in the housing areas, distribute grievance forms to inmates and provide information on grievance procedure.

Nominal Pay for Inmates

Inmates who serve on the committee are paid $1 a day. For officers, committee participation is treated as a regular job assignment.

When Joseph Lisa was appointed by the superintendent, he was resentful and suspicious. "I didn't care for it," he recalled. "I didn't know anything about it, and I didn't think it was necessary."

Years ago, Mr. Lisa said, prisoners' everyday problems could be handled by guards. Now, he said, "there are a lot of things that are not in our control. There are directives from the state, rules and regulations that seem obsolete.

"These things can be altered through a system like this. A lot of trouble can be avoided using this as an escape valve to air problems and bring them to the attention of the administration."

Since the inception of the program, 132 grievances have been filed, and at least 200 have been settled amicably through mediation according to the prison since clerk, Richard

Cooperative Market in Harlem Faces Eviction Over Back Rent

By C. GERALD FRASER

The Harlem River Consumer Cooperative, a supermarket built from the purchases of $5 and $10 shares by thousands of Harlemites, has been served with an eviction notice for non-payment of rent, by its landlord, the tenants of Esplanade Gardens, a Harlem cooperative housing development.

The cooperative supermarket is on Seventh Avenue at 147th Street on the grounds of the housing development.

The Esplanade Gardens board of directors voted in December to evict the supermarket, but waited until last week to act. The board contended that the seven-year-old cooperative supermarket owed rent amounting to $120,578.09.

A Four-Year Period
 Speaking for the board, Fitzgerald Wilson-Turner, the chairman, said that the money had been owed over a period of four years and that the housing board's motive in forcing out the supermarket was "purely a fiscal one."

He added: "The color of our stand is not black or white, only green."

Mr. Wilson-Turner gave several reasons for the housing development's action.

First, he said, was the amount of the back rent and the length of time it was owed. Second, Mr. Wilson-Turner said the Esplanade Gardens faced a projected 60 percent maintenance increase. Part of this projected increase, he said, is attributable to the amount owed by the supermarket.

Mr. Wilson-Turner also said that the supermarket had failed to honor agreements to allow it to pay current rent and a percentage of the arrears on a monthly basis. Finally, he said, tenants in Esplanade Gardens face eviction after they owe two months rent and there is no reason for treating the supermarket differently.

Figures Disputed
 Glen Glenn, treasurer of the supermarket, said yesterday that she and the store's board of directors were trying to "get with the board to pay off the rent." She said the amount was less than the eviction notice stipulated. Mrs. Glen said the market owed "around $86,000" in back rent.

The Harlem River Consumer Cooperative supermarket's attorney, Cora T. Walker, said that the situation viewed from a "fiscal point of view" showed that evicting the supermarket would "not put any money in Esplanade Gardens' pockets." Any eviction, she said, "would be an absolute tragedy."

The supermarket opened June 4, 1968, has weathered an 18-month labor dispute that began in 1969, has been the indictment of a number of prominent Harlem figures on charges of participating in a "labor-management fraud," ostensibly to force the market out of business.

6 Democratic Candidates Press Delegate Hunt Here

By FRANK LYNN

Six of the 11 announced Democratic Presidential candidates have started intensive campaigns for New York's 274 Democratic national convention delegates, and have thus assured that the state's April 6 Presidential primary, one of the earliest in the country, will be a major testing ground for the Democratic hopefuls.

Thousands of campaign workers for the Democratic Presidential contenders began canvassing the state last week for signatures of enrolled Democrats to qualify delegate candidates for a place on the primary ballot. Each delegate candidate will have to have 1,250 signatures in the Congressional District in which he is running.

With the petition gathering the first formal step in the electoral process, the major Democratic contenders in the state's Presidential primary as of now will be the following: Senator Birch Bayh of Indiana, who is collecting signatures for delegate slates in 38 of the state's 39 Congressional districts.

Former Gov. Jimmy Carter of Georgia, 35 districts.

Former Senator Fred Harris of Oklahoma, 36 districts.

Senator Henry M. Jackson of Washington State, 36 districts.

Representative Morris K. Udall of Arizona, 26 districts.

Gov. George C. Wallace of Alabama, 36 districts.

The regular Democratic organization is fielding uncommitted delegate slates in 20 districts across the state, supporting Senator Jackson in 11 other districts and Senator Bayh in one upstate district.

Some Uncommitted Slates

In addition, there are a scattering of uncommitted slates, such as those headed by Representatives Charles E. Rangel, Bella S. Abzug and Herman Badillo in the 19th, 20th and 21st Congressional Districts, in Manhattan and the Bronx.

There may be token efforts by one or two other Presidential contenders, but they are not expected to influence strongly the outcome of the primary, which will be the sixth primary in the nation.

There undoubtedly will be some winnowing of the delegate candidates, either because of setbacks to their candidates in other state primaries or inability to obtain enough valid signatures on designating petitions by Feb. 18, the last day for filing designating petitions.

Nevertheless, the prospect for the New York voter will be a mass of often-unfamiliar names and no indication on the ballot as to the Presidential preference of the delegate.

The delegate candidates are required to file a notarized statement with their uncommitted status or Presidential preference with the Democratic State Committee by Feb. 19, but that preference will not appear on either the designating petitions currently being circulated or on the primary ballot. It will be up to the candidates and newspapers to "educate" the voter as to the preference of the delegate candidates.

The delegate candidate with a preference in effect commits himself to a first ballot vote for his choice. However, he or she could be a free agent after that.

Thus Governor Carey and state Democratic leaders hope to have major influence on second-ballot choices if a bargaining situation develops at the Democratic National Convention, which begins here July 12. The candidates in turn hope to keep their delegates committed to them as long as necessary.

Jackson Edge Indicated

Although a prognosis is difficult at this point because of the crowded field and the lack of such an overriding issue as the war in Vietnam—the major issue in the last two Presidential primaries here—Senator Jackson may have a slight edge because of his overt and covert support in the Democratic regular organization, his appeal to Jewish voters—a major bloc in the Democratic primary—and the fact that he has described the New York primary as a "key" primary and has pledged a major effort here.

Top aides of the Democratic contenders concede in any event that the primary here could be heavily influenced by the outcome of earlier major primaries in New Hampshire, Massachusetts and Florida.

Governor Wallace, at this point, appears to be the least organized, relying heavily on political unknowns or paid workers.

He stands at one end of the philosophical spectrum in the New York primary, with Mr. Harris at the other end. The four other contenders are closer to the political center. In any event, the deep ideological divisions of the 1972 and 1968 primaries are not apparent yet, largely because such domestic issues as unemployment and the economy are the major issues.

One gauge of the candidates' strength and area of appeal in the state is the "name" Democrats on their slates. By that criteria, Mr. Wallace with none and Mr. Harris with few trail the others. Both are relying heavily on grass-roots volunteers, although Mr. Harris is considerably better organized than Mr. Wallace, having worked the state for a year.

Bayh's "Name" Delegates

Among the Bayh "name" delegates are Borough President Robert Abrams of the Bronx, City Councilmen Robert F. Wagner Jr. and Carter Burden, State Senator Karen S. Burstein, Assemblymen Richard N. Gottfried, G. Oliver Koppell and Herman D. Farrell Jr., Jimmy Breslin, the writer, and Victor Gotbaum and his wife, Sarah.

Mr. Gotbaum, a leader of the State, County and Municipal Employees Union, is running in Manhattan, while his wife is running in their home district in Westchester County. Many delegate candidates are running outside their home districts, since residency is not a prerequisite.

Mr. Carter's "name" delegates include William J. vanden Heuvel, former chairman of the city's Board of Correction and the co-chairman of the Carter campaign here; Margaret Costanza of Rochester, a Democratic national committeewoman; also campaign co-chairman; Donald H. Elliott, the former City Planning Commission chairman; Arthur Levitt Jr., former State Comptroller; Eleanor Clark French, a former City Human Rights Commissioner, and Assemblymen Stanley Fink and Maurice D. Hinchey.

Mr. Harris's "name" delegates include Antonio G. Olivieri, the former candidate for Democratic Lieutenant Governor nomination; State Senator Vander L. Beatty, Assemblyman Frank J. Barbero and City Councilman Edward L. Sadovsky.

Mayors on List

Senator Jackson's most prominent delegates include Representatives Mario Biaggi, James H. Scheuer, John M. Murphy and Samuel S. Stratton; Mayors Lee Alexander of Syracuse, Thomas P. Ryan of Rochester, Vincent Suozzi of Glen Cove, Robert Cronin of Glens Falls and Joseph Mink of Rensselaer; City Councilman Aileen E. Ryan of the Bronx, Assemblyman John C. Dearie and Marion Scotto, wife of Anthony Scotto, president of the powerful local 1814 of the International Longshoremen's Association.

Mr. Udall's "name" delegates also campaign co-chairman; include Representative Jonathan B. Bingham of the Bronx, Assemblymen Ronald A. Stott, Thomas R. Frey and A. B. Pete Gramis; former Assemblyman Peter A. A. Berle and Irma Badillo, wife of the Congressman who is running as an uncommitted delegate, and Connie Timberlake, president of the Syracuse School Board. Mr. Badillo will be running in the district he represents, while Mrs. Badillo will be running in the 23d District, in which they reside.

The primary could also serve as a test of strength between Mr. Badillo and City Councilman Ramon S. Velez, who is heading a regular organization uncommitted slate in Mr. Badillo's district. Mr. Velez is considered a competitor of Mr. Badillo for the political leadership of the sizable Puerto Rican community in the Bronx.

Another significant confrontation could come in Mrs. Abzug's district, where she will be heading an uncommitted slate, which will include Manfred Ohrenstein, minority leader of the State Senate, while Borough President Abrams is leading the Bayh slate. Both are considered prospects for the Democratic nomination for the United States Senate, which will be settled in the regular September primary.

GIRL CADETS RULING STIRS AN INSTITUTE

Special to The New York Times

ROSWELL, N. M., Jan. 17—The Board of Regents of the New Mexico Military Institute, decided yesterday to study the possible enrollment of girls.

Six cadet corps leaders attending the board meeting were assured that alumni and others were working to prevent an admission change at the 900-student school.

State Attorney General Tony Anaya has ruled that the state-administered school's exclusion of females violates the 1973 Equal Rights Amendment to the New Mexico Constitution. His decision resulted from a complaint by the New Mexico Commission on the Status of Women.

The Board of Regents noted that the "ruling does not have the power of a court decision" and that "the New Mexico courts have not ruled on the question."

The regents emphasized the need of "conscious study with due consideration of the ramifications inherent in such a potentially significant change of policy" before action was taken.

"We have not received a single application to date for admission from a female," Col. Phillip Farren, the institute's director of admissions, told the regents.

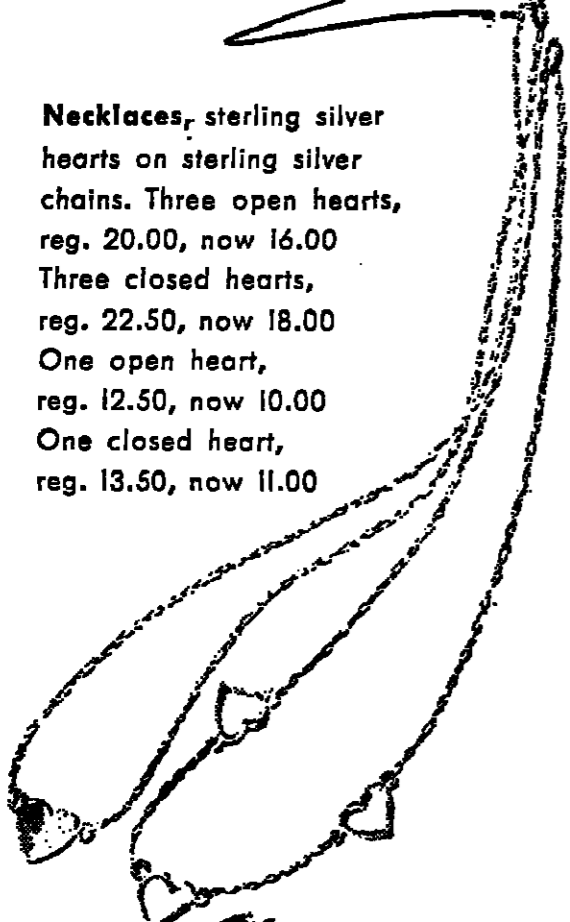

Rhode Island Aide Sentenced

WARWICK, R. I., Jan. 17 (AP)—State Senator Raymond P. Woodcock, Democrat of Warwick, was given a six-month suspended prison sentence Wednesday and placed on probation following his conviction for election fraud stemming from the 1974 state primary.

Iowa to Act on '76 Nominees Tomorrow

Continued From Page 1, Col. 3 and Vermont on March 2, but Rhode Island votes on June 1. Oregon and Idaho vote on May 25, but Washington holds precinct caucuses March 2. Confronted with a schedule that lists at least one primary every Tuesday from Feb. 24 to June 8, with only three exceptions, which ones should a candidate skip to allow time for campaigning in the major states? And what is to be done on June 8, with primaries in three states—California, New Jersey and Ohio—that together cast 36 percent of the 1,005 votes needed to win at the convention?

Changes in the Order
 Not only are there more primaries; the order has also been scrambled, with important consequences for some candidates.

New York, for example, will hold its primary early, on April 8, rather than last, as in 1972. For Senator Henry M. Jackson of Washington, that presents the opportunity to rally his Jewish and tradeunion support in an effort to score what would be a significant early triumph. Had New York been last again, he might not have got that far.

Or consider the case of Massachusetts, also earlier this year. It provides in the second week of the primary schedule an opportunity for Sargent Shriver to derive some momentum from his Kennedy connections and for Gov. George C. Wallace of Alabama to capitalize on the busing controversy in south Boston.

Crucial states, most notably California, have adopted new systems, further altering the political landscape for 1976.

These are the consequences, in large measure, of Senator George McGovern's narrow victory in California in 1972, when he barely defeated Senator Hubert H. Humphrey but nonetheless received, under the rule then prevailing, every one of California's big block of convention delegates.

To prevent a repetition of the controversy that ensued, the Democratic Party outlawed such winner-take-all primaries.

Proportional Representation

The 1976 rules require, with one exception, that all primaries and caucuses be operated on the principle of proportional representation—that is, that delegates must be allocated in rough proportion to each candidate's share of the popular vote or share of strength in precinct caucuses. A state may avoid proportionality by electing delegates directly by Congressional districts. In that event, the winner in each district is highly likely to get all the delegates allotted to the district.

California went further than it needed to, setting up a district direct-election system but providing for proportional representation within each district. The system all but guarantees that the state's 280 delegate votes will be splintered, depriving it of the influence that it once wielded. "California has destroyed itself as a force in the party," commented Mark Segal, executive director of the Democratic National Committee.

While proportionality allows for a broader representation of views, it will make it far more difficult for any candidate to assemble a majority. Together with partial Federal funding of campaigns, proportionality may also encourage candidates with no chance of winning to stay in the race, thus inhibiting the development of the consensus a party needs.

In 1976, the Democratic delegates will be chosen as follows, barring last-minute changes in state election laws:

Delegate election primaries involving no proportional representation will be used by 12 states, including six of the 10 largest—Illinois, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania and the so-called "beauty contests" in which voters cast ballots essential nominees in a contest that has no bearing on the selection of delegates. These states offer the only chances for a sweep by an especially strong candidate, and they may be in a strong bargaining position in the event of a deadlock at the convention.

Proportional-representation primaries, either at the state or district level, will be used by 14 states and the District of Columbia, including four of the 10 largest states—California, Florida, Massachusetts and Michigan.

In most cases, voters will mark their ballots for Presidential candidates, who will be allotted their share of delegates at subsequent conventions or committee meetings. Only candidates who reach a certain threshold, usually 15 percent, will be entitled to delegates.

The primaries vary widely in detail. For example, in some states, such as New Hampshire, the list of names on the ballot is composed of the candidates who have met filing requirements. In others, such as Massachusetts, the Secretary of State compiles a list of candidates, and anyone who wants to be removed must file a statement of noncandidacy. It still others, such as Oregon, the Secretary of State's list is final, with no withdrawals.

One state, Tennessee, has yet to decide between a delegate-selection primary and a caucus system. Its current law provides for a winner-take-all primary on May 6, which violates national party rules.

Finally, 23 states will use some variant of the caucus system, including two, Wisconsin and Vermont, that will also stage "beauty contest" primaries. Wisconsin was forced to turn to a caucus plan because state law permits Republicans to cross over into the Democratic primary, also a violation of national party rules.

The two largest caucus states are Missouri, with 71 delegates, and Minnesota, with 65.

Four states used mixed systems—Delaware, Arizona,

Louisiana and Connecticut. These involve party-sponsored rather than state-sponsored balloting at a lower level, leading to conventions. But the most common system is that used in Iowa, where four steps lead to the election of national convention delegates.

The first step, on Monday night, is the precinct caucuses, where neighbors gather in homes across the state. They divide into subcaucuses according to their preference (either a candidate or uncommitted). Each subcaucus that has 15 percent or more of the total number present at the caucus is entitled to select one or more delegates to the county conventions March 6.

If experience is any guide, those whose subcaucuses are too small will tend to join with the uncommitted group in the hope that committed delegates at later stages can be won over to their candidate. The dynamics of the process thus favor an uncommitted posture and encourage later consensus-building.

Suppose, for example, that 27 persons appear for a caucus in a precinct entitled to nine delegates, and that they divide as follows: nine for candidate "A," six for candidate "B," three for candidate "C," two for candidate "D" and seven uncommitted. The supporters of "C" and "D" fall below 15 percent, so they join the uncommitteds, giving that group 12 members. "A" then gets three delegates, "B" gets two and the uncommitted bloc gets four.

The same process is repeated at the county conventions, which choose 3,421 delegates to the six district conventions on April 10. They elect 40 national convention delegates, six from districts and seven from others, on a proportional basis. The same 3,421 reassemble as a state convention on May 23 to elect seven more delegates, again proportionally.

AMERICANS SEE RISE IN COMMUNIST MIGHT

About two-thirds of the people of the United States are convinced that the world power of the Soviet Union and China will increase, but less than half the Americans think the power of their own country will grow, according to a recent survey.

The latest Gallup poll showed that 62 percent of the American people believed United States power in the world would increase this year, while 44 percent believed it would decline. More Americans are beginning to believe that the power of the Soviet Union and China is growing, according to the poll results, in which 63 percent of the people questioned said they expected Soviet power to increase and 65 percent said the same of China's power.

In the survey 1,537 adults, 18 years old and older, were interviewed from Dec. 12 to 15, in more than 300 areas.

GOLDMAN SCORES JEWISH POLICIES

World Congress Head Calls for Political Reassessing

By IRVING SPIEGEL
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17—A longtime leader in Jewish affairs said tonight that "present political policies" of the world Jewish community imperil its survival by its failure to cope with the "new political realities" emerging in the world. Dr. Nahum Goldmann, president of the World Jewish Congress, in remarks he had prepared for delivery, called for Jewish leadership to reassess its political methods, which he criticized as lacking "long-range initiatives in dealing with the developing threats of the Third World and Communist blocs."

"It is one of the weaknesses of present Jewish policy to deal only with momentary problems, to react only to crisis," Dr. Goldmann told the B'nai B'rith board of governors. The board, the top policy body of the 500,000-member Jewish service organization, opened its three-day annual meeting at the Mayflower Hotel.

Dr. Goldmann said there was a need to establish Jewish contact with Third World nations "that know little about and therefore have no real understanding of Jewish concerns and aspirations."

Dr. Goldmann, who formerly headed the World Zionist organization, has often advocated political approaches that contrasted with the policies of Israel's political leaders. The 80-year-old Zionist leader also reiterated his long-held view that conflict with the Soviet Union over the issues of free emigration and Jewish rights should not bar efforts by the Jewish community to maintain a dialogue with the Soviets as the possible means for reaccelerating Jewish emigration.

Soviet Jewish emigration to Israel, which reached a peak of some 33,400 in 1973, dropped to about 12,000 last year.

This effort to hold a dialogue does not mean that Jewish leadership should refrain from maintaining a "strong posture of protest" against suppressions of Jewish religious, cultural and communal rights in the Soviet Union," Dr. Goldmann said.

He cited what he termed the "growing isolation of Israel" as an outgrowth of a changing international scene in which the political dominance of the technologically advanced democracies — whom Jews sought out to defend their religious and political rights—was being diminished by the rise of new political forces.

ure to resist the Nazi annihilation of Jews.

Urging Jewish leadership to reassess its political approaches, he warned that "the Jewish people cannot continue to secure its survival by means which were useful and effective in past generations but have to be changed to meet a new world situation."

Such a reassessment, he added, should be "determined as far as possible in a united and cooperative forum" of the Jewish communities in the Diaspora and Israel "because the new complexities affect them all."

The World Jewish Congress is a representative body, composed of national Jewish groups or Jewish communities in more than 60 countries. Its primary focus is international Jewish affairs, and it maintains offices in major capital cities. The congress also conducts Jewish cultural programs through offices in Jerusalem and London.

Teamsters in Chicago Gaining Power With Aid to Fitzsimmons lawyer in Chicago said. The changes will be officially adopted when the teamster executive board meets in Palm Springs, Calif., on Jan. 27.

No high teamster official would agree to be interviewed about the changes or about the current negotiations for a new national master freight agreement, the basic document covering 400,000 truckers throughout the country.

The teamster contract expires on March 31, and, according to some observers close to the teamsters, the union will be hard pressed to win concessions as large as it needs to satisfy its membership.

Mr. Fitzsimmons, who was meant to be a caretaker until James R. Hoffa got back from prison, has remained in office for nine years, as long as Mr. Hoffa held the job.

Mr. Fitzsimmons was embarrassed during the contract talks in 1967 and 1970 when Mr. Peick refused to go along with the national master freight agreement he had negotiated and held out for a better settlement.

Observers say that Mr. Fitzsimmons was embarrassed during the contract talks in 1967 and 1970 when Mr. Peick refused to go along with the national master freight agreement he had negotiated and held out for a better settlement.

The name most often mentioned as a possible challenger to Mr. Fitzsimmons is Roy Williams, the teamster vice president from Kansas City, Mo., who is head of the union's freight division.

Williams has been leaning on Fitz and saying "You haven't done enough for me." A Washington observer said Mr. Williams was named chairman of the negotiating committee and he will move up to replace Mr. Schoessling as head of the Central States Conference, the largest of the four teamster area conferences.

Mr. Schoessling, who is 70 years old brings to his new post of secretary-treasurer a reputation for honesty.

"A Very Honest Guy" "Ray is a very honest guy," a Chicago labor lawyer said. He's got the respect of everybody. He's very close to the Mayor. And he's very jealous of his reputation of integrity.

Some people say that the appointment of Mr. Schoessling was made because of his reputation, because the teamsters, under attack again because of alleged irregularities in the Central States pension fund and because of Mr. Hoffa's disappearance, need an honest man.

"They need him more than he needs them," a Chicago lawyer said. "He gives them the veneer they want."

Mr. Schoessling was head of the brewery and soft drink local in Chicago, a relatively small local, but in 1951 he became secretary-treasurer of Chicago's Joint Council 25, then president of the council, then head of the Central States Conference when Harold J. Gibbons was forced out in 1972.

"He wields power with the lightest touch I have ever seen," a lawyer who is a close friend said.

"Ray's influence is by consensus in Chicago," another lawyer said. "He has been vested with the power to make a lot of decisions, but he is bright enough and astute enough to constantly nurture this consensus."

In 1955, Mr. Schoessling was the first important labor leader to support Richard Daley's quest for the mayoralty, and Mr. Daley has remained mindful of the debt, though the Mayor declined to be interviewed on the subject of Mr. Schoessling.

Louis Peick will become an international vice president of teamsters.

Murray W. Miller is retiring as secretary-treasurer of the union.

The changes are aimed at solidifying Frank E. Fitzsimmons' control.

convention center in Chicago. He has also been head of the Boy Scout jamboree.

"Ray Schoessling is one of the best thought-of labor leaders in Chicago," a teamster lawyer there said.

"The picture is not all bright. He's not a Walter Reuther by any means," one Chicago leader said. "He does not do anything with a social conscience," another said.

"On the district council level, he runs a very clean ship," the labor leader said, "but some of the locals are very shady, and he closes his eyes."

Louis Peick, who is head of the Chicago joint council and who moves up to be an international vice president, is considered to be of equal caliber with Mr. Schoessling.

"I'm satisfied that Louis Peick can use more words than a sailor from Tanzania, has got a great deal of integrity, and he's a good team member," another friend said.

"Schoessling is a team guy," another friend said. "I don't look for him to make palace revolutions in Washington."

By appointing Mr. Schoessling and Mr. Peick now, Mr. Fitzsimmons will be able to go into the June convention with a slate of incumbents behind him.

Also, observers say, he will rely on Mr. Schoessling to hold Mr. Peick in line during the difficult trucking negotiations.

The teamsters have called for a $2.50-an-hour pay rise during the three years of the contract, to be added to the average $7.11 an hour truck drivers earn now.

In addition, they are seeking an additional $12 week per member for health, welfare and pension benefits. And they already need $5.22 a week per member to bring the pension plan into line with the new Federal pension requirements without any increase in benefits.

Nixon Reported Tying Kissinger to T

official. None of the targets was removed from his job or prosecuted for having leaked national security matters as a result of the operation.

Mr. Halperin, who was wiretapped for the longest period, 21 months, has sued Mr. Nixon, Mr. Kissinger, other present and former Government officials, the current director of the F.B.I. and the Chesapeake and Potomac Telephone Company. His suit contends the wiretaps were illegal. He also charged that the tap was continued on his telephone after he had ceased having access to national security matters and, later, when he left Government, because the Nixon Administration sought to use for political purposes information gathered by the taps.

Mr. Nixon, according to his associates, denied this in Thursday's testimony. He reportedly said that he ordered what he regarded as a legal wiretapping program for the sole purpose of finding out about and halting national security leaks.

He also denied, several sources said, any knowledge of a plan in the White House to prepare a paper to counter criticism of his Vietnam policy being planned by Clark M. Clifford, a Washington lawyer who had served as Secretary of Defense under President Johnson and as an aide in the Truman Administration.

According to evidence gathered in the case, John D. Ehrlichman, then chief of the Domestic Council of the White House, learned in December 1969, from an F.B.I. report on a conversation between Mr. Halperin and Mr. Clifford, that Mr. Clifford planned to write an article in a magazine criticizing Mr. Nixon's Vietnam policy.

Copies Went to Ehrlichman

At that time the F.B.I. was sending reports on the tap to Mr. Kissinger and to the President, but Mr. Ehrlichman was receiving the President's copy. With the approval of H.R. Haldeman, then chief of staff at the White House, documents showed, Mr. Ehrlichman ordered Jeb Stuart Magruder to prepare material to counter Mr. Clifford's charges.

Mr. Nixon said in his deposition that he had not ordered this chain of events and had been unaware it was taking place. According to one associate of Mr. Nixon, the former President is "very relaxed" when he discusses the wiretap issue. "I think he went into that deposition session to persuade Mr. Halperin that his decision on the leaks was correct," one source said.

The deposition was taken Thursday in an office at Mr. Nixon's compound at San Clemente south of here. Mr. Nixon and a court reporter sat at one table while Mr. Halperin and his lawyers occupied another.

Persons who attended the session related some interesting aspects of the former President's behavior. He never, for instance, drank water in the three-hour morning session of the four and a half-hour afternoon session.

Talks About Super Bowl

He was loquacious and answered all the questions at length, creating a transcript that had short question areas and long pages of his answers. At several points he lectured his hearers on foreign policy decisions and, one source said, the transcript, when made public, would provide new information on President Nixon's foreign policy decisions.

This source declined to make the matters public. From time to time Mr. Nixon reportedly had sharp exchanges with John Shattuck, the lawyer-of-the-liberties union designated to interrogate Mr. Nixon.

As though to provide an atmosphere of congeniality at the start of the afternoon session, Mr. Nixon was said to have given his listeners a long dissertation on the football strategy of tomorrow's Super Bowl game. When he entered the session Thursday the President wore a shirt with what one source called "a rather large coffee stain" on its neck. He later changed his shirt and tie.

Mr. Nixon confirmed that, in May 1970, a year after the first tapes went on, he had ordered that the F.B.I. reports on the telephone conversations be sent to Mr. Haldeman and not to Mr. Kissinger and himself.

Told Others Used Taps

He said, several sources reported, that he had not wanted his chief adviser for foreign affairs spending his time reading logs of F.B.I. surveillances.

According to the sources, Mr. Nixon said he had decided to centralize the responsibility for reviewing the reports in Mr. Haldeman because Mr. Hoover wanted to deal with only one person at the White House. Mr. Nixon reportedly said that he regarded the operation as legal under the current law and that Mr. Hoover had assured him that wiretaps had been used in previous elections to find leaks.

Recent State and Justice Department investigations of the Bureau of Investigation confirmed that Robert Kennedy, when he was Attorney General, ordered wiretapping to find out if they obtained information in the early days of the campaign.

Mr. Kennedy, the evidence showed, had the F.B.I. Government aides du jour, the Administration's inquiry into whether the information on sugar with the Dominicans was being manipulated.

The contradictions Mr. Nixon's testimony material made public of Mr. Kissinger's week may be resolved in a meeting, Kissinger's deposition, Halperin and his lawyer.

Mr. Halperin has contended that his case, if successful, will cause Government officials to decide to stop tapping the future.

Mr. Halperin has said he believes that the use of a wiretap is illegal, even to see news leaks. He is not himself, his wife and three children, $100,000 for each day he is in jail. The case, he says, estimates a right to a settlement between $1 million and $3 million.

NEWS GUILD FACES LOSS IN CAPITAL

Washington Post Dissidents Debate Resigning

By BEN A. FRANKLIN

Special to The New York Times WASHINGTON, Jan. 17—Some members of the Newspaper Guild at The Washington Post, who have angered their own and other labor unions by crossing picket lines and continuing to work during a bitter 15-week strike by the newspaper's craft workmen, are drawing plans for a mass withdrawal from the guild.

Those members of the guild who want to withdraw cite internal union disciplinary proceedings against them for crossing picket lines.

At an "information meeting" on disaffiliation plans last night, about 70 of the 800 guild members at The Post were plainly anxious and divided about what they described as a conflict between their belief in trade unionism and their dissatisfaction with the guild's Washington-Baltimore local, of which The Post unit is a part. About 200 Post guildsmen have refused to cross the picket line.

The sentiment for independence from the guild seems to be growing. Officials of the National Newspaper Guild, whose headquarters is just across Fifteenth Street from The Post building here, are known to be deeply concerned.

The "Premier" Contract The Post unit is one of the Newspaper Guild's largest shops and the holder of what is called its "premier" contract, one that requires wages and benefits that are among the highest in the industry.

The guild is reported to have spent between $600,000 and $700,000 last year—often citing The Post's "showcase contract" as an inducement—in organizing campaigns that produced about 675 new members. So the prospect of the loss of 800 members as a result of the labor dispute at The Post is regarded somberly by guild officials.

A position paper submitted to the national guild office by The Post dissidents this week said, "The trend of events seems to be forcing all of us out."

"If we leave the guild—whether by expulsion or decertification—we want our colleagues across the land to know it is because we have struck with our principles," the statement declared.

The statement, most of which is to appear Monday in The Guild Reporter, the bi-weekly of the national union, was signed by 15 guildsmen at The Post, including four former unit chairmen and a former president of the Washington-Baltimore local.

New Local Sought The statement says the "most broadly supported" action favored by the dissidents is a break by The Post unit with the two-city local and the formation of a separate Post local. This, however, would require the approval of the parent local—required by most guild officials as extremely unlikely.

Unless this or some other resolution can be worked out, the statement says, "the future of the Newspaper Guild at The Post is dim."

A factor in the dispute that could build pressure for disaffiliation is the Jan. 26-29 meeting here of the guild's International Executive Board. Several of the 15 signers of The Post dissidents' statement met on Jan. 6 with Charles A. Perlik Jr., the guild president and a member of the executive board. They were reported to have told him that a possible way to head off disaffiliation by The Post unit would be to appoint a union contract negotiator other than Brian J. Flores, administrative officer of the Washington-Baltimore local.

Charges that Mr. Flores has been "arrogant," "dictatorial" and "vindictive" have marked many of the Post guildsmen's expressions of resentment at and defiance of the union. The guild contract at The Post expires in 11 weeks, and negotiations led by Mr. Flores for a new one would normally begin soon.

Reward for Defiance A number of union officials said that members of the guild executive board were likely to feel that either the formation of a new local or the replacement of Mr. Flores—even if permitted by the guild's constitution—would be seen, in effect, as "rewarding defiance" by The Post unit. Any attempt to remove Mr. Flores as The Post unit's negotiator would be further complicated, these officials said, by the fact that Mr. Flores and Mr. Perlik are political adversaries within the union. Mr. Flores, who has opposed Mr. Perlik twice in elections for guild president and is considered likely to do so again, could assert that he was being punished for his political insurgency, the officials said. If the board does not arrange some compromise by the end of the month, however, another factor will come into effect.

Walkout by Pittsburgh Teachers Brings Frustration and Impasse

By JAMES T. WOOTEN

Special to The New York Times PITTSBURGH, Jan. 17—A frustrated member of this city's Board of Education produced a news perspective yesterday on the teachers' strike that has paralyzed public education here for the last seven weeks.

"At least, we're giving the world a new symbol," he said, smiling slightly. "Hobson's Choice is now passed. Henceforth, a dilemma will be known as a 'Pittsburgh Choice.'"

However significant it may be in terms of the language, his attempt at grim humor did touch the essence of the impasse here between 4,000 angry teachers who want more money and an adamant school board that insists it is not possible.

It began Dec. 1 when the teachers' contract expired and they declined to work without a new one. Now, after 48 days, very little has changed.

A judge has ordered an end to the strike, but the picket lines are holding firm. He has charged the teachers with contempt of court, but their disobedience continues. He has imposed individual and collective fines on the teachers and their union, now totaling more than $1.5 million, but there is still no sign of a settlement.

No Plan to Return He had seized and, for a time, padlocked the union's headquarters and assets as security for the fines, but there is still not the slightest indication that the teachers plan to return to the classrooms.

Public pressure is mounting, there are growing signs of tension, the newspapers and television stations have called for an end to the walkout—but the strike still goes on.

"Let's see if I can put this simply," Albert Fondy, president of the Pittsburgh Federation of Teachers, said yesterday. "We are not going back to work until we have a new contract. Is that clear enough? No contract, no work!"

In response, a spokesman for the Board of Education reiterated its position. "They are asking for money we do not have," he said. "They are asking for money we cannot raise, and since we do not have it and cannot raise it, we cannot contract to pay it. It is that simple enough?"

Perhaps, but the issues intertwining the long dispute are much more complex: a mixture of state statutes and local law, bureaucratic policies and political change. "There's no doubt about it," a picketing teacher said. "It is a royal mess."

More Than Offered He and his colleagues, who earn between $13,000 and $17,000 a year, are asking for increases that average $1,300 more than the board's highest offer, a sum the board believes is the most it can pay with its present sources of revenue. To pay more, the board insists, would require tax increases that cannot be levied without an authorizing act by the legislature. Therefore, according to the board, any contract with the teachers must be negotiated on the basis of present tax rates—and, the board contends that they are insufficient to meet the teachers' demands.

Local legislators seem less than interested in drafting, introducing and sponsoring a bill that would authorize an increase adequate for the teachers' request. Moreover, the Board of Education, now appointed by the City Council, is about to be

CALL FOR QUOTAS ELATES STEELMEN

Industry and Union Support Ruling on Some Imports

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17—Steel union and industry leaders expressed satisfaction today with the decision late last night by the Government's International Trade Commission recommending that President Ford impose quotas on imports of stainless steel and other alloy "specialty" steels.

The commission, by a 4-to-1 vote with one member abstaining, ruled that imports of those products, principally from Japan and Sweden, were injuring the domestic industry.

In their joint statement, the labor-industry group criticized what they termed the "predatory price-cutting practices of the foreign specialty steel producers—whose facilities are owned, directed or heavily subsidized by their governments."

69% of Market They contended that these imports had "captured up to more than 60 percent of the United States market" for certain products and had been responsible for high unemployment in some parts of the American steel industry.

Joining in the statement were I. W. Abel, president of the United Steelworkers of America, and five executives acting as spokesmen for the industry—William H. Knoell of the Cyclops Corporation; Robert L. Loughhead of the Jessop Steel Company; Eugene A. March of the Crucible Materials Corp.; Colt Industries; Marshall Schober of the Latrobe Steel Company; and Richard P. Simmons of the Allegheny Ludlum Steel Corporation.

The commission's findings pose the first major international trade policy decision for President Ford, who must make up his mind within the next 60 days.

3 Choices for Ford He has three options under the 1974 trade law, which was the basis for the industry's petition for relief. He can accept the commission's recommendation for quotas to prevent further increases in such imports; he can reject the recommendation altogether and impose no new import barriers, but only if he makes a ruling that restraints are "not in the national economic interest"; or he can adopt import relief of a less severe kind than quotas.

If the President takes action that is different from the commission's recommendation, he must explain his decision to Congress, which could override it within 90 days.

In its ruling, the commission said that imports of these alloy steels were worth $229 million last year. The major steel products, such as sheet and structural steel, are not affected by last night's ruling, but producers of those products are also seeking import restraints.

Suspect in Dispute on Gag Order Convicted of Nebraska Murder

North Platte, Neb., Jan. 17 (AP)—Erwin Charles Simants was convicted of six counts of first-degree murder today in a trial that became a center of a free press-fair trial controversy because of a judge's gag order.

The murder charges stemmed from the slayings of six members of the Henry Kelle family, three adults and three children. They were shot to death Oct. 18 at the Kelle home, next door to where Mr. Simants lived with his sister and brother-in-law.

The jury of seven women and five men met for two hours today, following about two and a half hours of deliberations last night after Judge Hugh Stuart in Lincoln County District Court delivered his final instructions.

Mr. Simants, 30 years old, had pleaded not guilty by reason of insanity. He was also charged with sexual assault in the case, but under Nebraska law that charge was considered part of the murder charge.

Sentencing was scheduled for Jan. 29. The penalty for first-degree murder is either death or life imprisonment, which is set by the jury panel set up by the judge.

Judge Stuart had told they should consider a "pre-trial news coverage" and the question of Mr. Simants' sanity in reaching verdict.

The trial began Jan. 14. A court-imposed gag pre-trial news coverage that pushed the case to nationwide prominence.

A county judge in order barring newsmen reporting certain aspects preliminary proceedings were held in open court. Judge Stuart dissolved lower court's order by mentioning one of his own which newsmen, although were aware of a state Mr. Simants admitting the six, were not able to.

A coalition of Nebraska organizations appealed to the Nebraska Court and to the United States Supreme Court, which is expected to hear oral argument this spring.

Computer Switching of Long Distance Telephone Calls Put in Operation by A.T.&T.

By VICTOR K. McELHENEY

A long-planned electronic revolution in the nation's long-distance telephone system began yesterday in Chicago as the first of a network of computer-controlled call-switching equipment went into service. The gradually spreading network is intended to save the long-distance system $1.5 billion in annual operating costs by 1985, and to cut the average time for putting through direct-dial calls from 10 seconds to two.

According to John D. Debutts, chairman of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, introduction of the new switching equipment will further enable the Bell System to hold down interstate rates while increasing the flexibility of the long-distance network that currently handles a daily average of 30 million completed calls and may handle 10 times that many in the year 2000.

The harbinger of the changes forecast was an ultracompact, ultrarapid switching center called Chicago 7 — the first purely electronic, no-moving-part exchanges in Bell System history — that began service high up in a windowless building on South Canal Street.

At a typical time for telephone system "outages," a low-traffic Saturday afternoon, the computer-controlled center began making long-distance connections from some Chicago exchanges to points in Southern Illinois, Ohio, Florida and California.

According to John D. Lear, a district engineering manager for the Illinois Bell Telephone Company, which jointly owns Chicago 7 with the Long Lines Department, outgoing calls from more than 70 other Chicago area local switching centers will be fed into Chicago 7 until mid-March, and then incoming calls will be added gradually until April 24.

Ag service began, the so-called 1-A processor, the supervisory computer for Chicago 7, operated noiselessly in a brightly lit, carpeted office lined with red notebooks filled with the computer's programs.

Nearby, on about 9,000 square feet of highly polished, gray-plastic floor tiles, the machinery of a No. 4 Electronic Switching System, or No. 4 E.S.S., also operated in virtual silence. Earlier such systems, introduced since 1965 and still containing some mechanical contact-switches, serve local customers.

Four Times Faster The system was processing calls entirely in the digital code used in most computers and in some high-volume urban area short-distance telephone lines. By operating this way, the No. 4 E.S.S. is designed to achieve four times the speed of its electro-mechanical predecessor, the so-called 4-A Crossbar system, and thus handle up to 550,000 calls an hour.

Occupying two 20,000-square-foot floors immediately above Chicago 7 is one of the 4-A systems, called Chicago 6. In contrast to the noiseless, completely electronic operation of Chicago 7, the switching equipment of Chicago 6 clicked noisily.

The No. 4 E.S.S. system was developed over five years, mainly at the Indian Hill laboratory of Bell Telephone Laboratories in Naperville, Ill. The Western Electric Company, manufacturing arm of the Bell System, invested about $400 million in the project, including the cost of establishing a new factory at Lisle, Ill., about a mile away from the laboratory.

The new type of long-distance switching center, serving as a kind of communications gateway to an area, is also to be placed into service in Kansas City, Mo.; Jacksonville, Fla.; and Dallas by the end of the year, and in seven other cities next year. Ten more installations are planned during 1978.

Two of the No. 4 E.S.S. installations are to start service in New York City in August 1977 and April 1978. Another is scheduled to begin operating in Freehold, N. J., in May 1978.

Another facet of the system built into the computer programs for each of these centers will be the ability to channel "housekeeping" information about a call — such as the number being called, whether it is ringing or busy or being answered — onto circuits separate from those used in conversations.

This ability is called by telephone engineers "Common Channel Interoffice Signaling," or C.C.I.S., which Mr. Debutts said Friday "is more exciting to assure you, than its name implies."

Placing the extra information about calls on separate circuits economizes on voice circuits, telephone engineers explain. Each of the 15 million "failed attempts" to place a long-distance call on an average day occupies a circuit, however briefly, without producing revenue.

When the C.C.I.S. system becomes general, Mr. Hough said, connections will only be established when the telephone that has been called answers. "Then we'll set up the call in the time it takes to pick up the set and put it to your ear," Mr. Hough said.

Mr. Debutts said that C.C.I.S. will sharply reduce the time it takes to make connections, thereby expanding the capacity of our network, and it will provide much more flexibility in routing calls, thereby reducing the number that might get hung up because of heavy traffic or some emergency affecting our facilities.

Effect on Toll Evaders By placing the signals related to a call on separate circuits, C.C.I.S. will also increase greatly the difficulty that so-called "phone phreaks" have in placing long-distance calls without paying toll charges by using devices that imitate the phone system's internal tone signals.

needed to handle an expected 40 billion long distance calls in the year 2000, according to the Bell System. The No. 4 E.S.S., costing far less per unit of capacity than its predecessor, using only 60 percent as much electricity, and requiring smaller maintenance and operating crews, also occupies so much less space, Mr. Hough said, that virtually all the No. 4's can go into existing telephone buildings.

Because of the savings from using the No. 4 E.S.S. in long-distance switching, local telephone companies are examining the use of it in switching centers that handle traffic between exchanges within a city.

They also plan to use the new 1-A processor to increase the capacity of local electronic exchanges. The first such installation, involving three Chicago exchanges, is to go into service next January, Mr. Lear said.

When the C.C.I.S. system becomes general, Mr. Hough said, connections will only be established when the telephone that has been called answers. "Then we'll set up the call in the time it takes to pick up the set and put it to your ear," Mr. Hough said.

Retirement money.

Now. Start with as little as $100. You'll get East River's highest interest rate plus special tax advantages. And retire richer than you ever dreamed possible.

Plan I — You Have No Pension Plan. If there's no pension plan where you work, you can open an IRA account at East River and deposit, as a tax-savings deduction, 15% of your annual income (maximum $1,500 each person, or $3,000 for an eligible, employed couple). Both the money you contribute and the high annual interest earned are tax-free until retirement, when your tax bracket is likely to be lower.

East River Interest Is What Makes You Rich. As shown in the table below, it's East River's high interest that changes modest savings into accumulated wealth. At $1,500 a year for 40 years, your contribution will amount to $60,000. But East River adds over $380,000 in interest, for a retirement total of more than $440,000 provided principal and interest remain in your IRA account until that time.

Earn Maximum Interest With Minimum Deposit. Start building your retirement money account immediately. Open your IRA account now with as little as $100 and begin earning East River's annual yield of 8.17% which is 7.75% a year compounded daily. And you can make deposits of $100 or more anytime during the year up to the maximum of $1,500 for each person. To qualify for this high rate, the money is required to be left on deposit in a savings certificate for a minimum of 6 years — maximum of 7 years. Other savings plans with shorter maturities are also available. However, interest rates and minimum deposit requirements vary with these alternative plans.

Recently Retired Or Changed Jobs. If you're changing jobs or retiring and receiving a distribution from a qualified pension or profit sharing plan, you can "roll over" these proceeds within 60 days into an East River IRA plan and avoid paying any current income taxes on the distribution.

Special Combination IRA with Savings Bank Life Insurance Retirement Income Policy. East River also has a special plan that combines Savings Bank Life Insurance with a high interest savings plan. This plan maximizes estate benefits in the event of your death or provides for annuity payments in your retirement years, starting as early as age 60, guaranteed for life! The insurance feature guarantees completion of that portion of the plan. Important disability benefits are available. Radical Group Presses New Bicentennial View

By ROBERT REINHOLD
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17—The Revolution has gone professional. No more smudgy mimeographed fliers, childish flag-burnings and hokey chants against imperialism. Now the Revolution is a slick and scientific effort, with costly public opinion surveys, smoothly written books, $20 library kits, hired political consultants and slick newspaper ads.

The Peoples Bicentennial Commission, a frankly radical alternative to the official celebrations, knows what it is doing in its call for the demise of capitalism and the rise of "economic democracy" in which workers control industry.

Small but adroit, the commission has stolen much of the Bicentennial thunder from its original counterpart, the American Revolution Bicentennial Commission, by using many of the establishment's own best techniques, including shrewd public relations and sales efforts.

The Peoples Commission started what it calls its "year-long communications campaign against big business" with a nearly full page advertisement appearing in Section 4 of tomorrow's New York Times. The ad, prepared by Marilla, Kayne, Kiley & Thorne Inc., political consultants, calls on readers to "teach big business a few lessons about democracy." It cost $10,406.55, cash on the barrelhead.

Direct Mail Costlier

This was chicken feed compared with the $80,000 the group spent this week for a 650,000-piece direct mail solicitation, the commission has a solid credit rating with the banks. It is not made up of the average storefront revolutionaries.

By now five years ago by remnants of the "new left" movement of the 1960's, the commission reaped lots of heat by taunting the official commission, which was then headed by rampant partisan politics and commercialism. The radical commission staged noisy counter-demonstrations to the official reenactments of the Boston

NEW LOBSTER SITES SEEN OFF FLORIDA

Three Areas Are Expected to Aid Idle Fishermen

Special to The New York Times

MIAMI, Jan. 17—Federal and state researchers have discovered three new and potentially rich lobster areas off south Florida, but lobstermen would have to use new equipment to fish the area.

The discoveries were announced this week by the Florida Department of Natural Resources in Tallahassee and the United States Southeast Fisheries Center in Miami.

The new sites are expected to provide additional fishing grounds for about 1,200 commercial fishermen here who have been generally idle since last Aug. 1 when the Nassau Government prohibited foreign boats from fishing spiny lobsters in the Bahamian continental shelf.

For years, lobstermen have been fished in shallow waters off south Florida, from Naples on the Gulf Coast to Stuart on the Atlantic Coast. The annual catch in Florida in a good year is about six million pounds. Lobsters, now in season, sell on a fish market at about $3 a pound.

Lobstering by Floridians in the Bahamas, which used to harvest about four million pounds a year, was often done in less than 30 feet of water.

Deeper Water Involved

The three new sites have been found in waters 120 to 180 feet deep. To take advantage of the find, Florida fishermen would have to use heavier traps and stronger lines and buoys.

Two areas are in the Gulf of Mexico about 80 miles due west of Naples and Sanibel Island. The third was discovered about five miles east off Miami in the Atlantic.

The research vessel Hernan Cortez of the natural resources department began looking for lobster sites off Naples last October.

Using sonar and underwater television cameras, researchers first found a number of reef formations that are the spiny lobster's preferred habitat.

Later scuba divers submerged to verify the presence of the crustaceans, which are closely related to the Maine lobsters.

"During 10 minute dives in about 120 to 150 feet of water some divers have counted a dozen lobsters, which indicates the presence of considerable quantity of this species," said Edward Joyce, who heads Florida's lobster search program.

Mr. Joyce said that on one occasion a diver caught a seven-pound lobster "which is typical of unfished population of that species." An average lobster weighs one pound.

Some Below 200 Feet

Off Miami, the search was carried out by diving alone and there, too, lobsters were found "in marketable quantities" in waters even deeper than 200 feet.

"With the demand for lobsters growing, fishermen for whom it used to be fairly easy to fish in the shallows, will have to go deeper and deeper," said Harvey R. Bullis, director of the fisheries center.

"The state and we are planning to continue bottom sea photograph and habitat study to encourage commercial fishing in deep waters," he said.

Defense in 'Zebra' Trial Calls Key Witness a 'Vicious Liar'

By HENRY WEINSTEIN
Special to The New York Times

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 17—During closing arguments in the "Zebra" murder trial in Superior Court here this week, a defense attorney, Clinton White, charged that the chief prosecution witness, Anthony C. Harris, was a "vicious liar" who had fabricated stories about a conspiracy among Black Muslims to kill whites.

In the early phases of the trial, Mr. Harris testified that the four defendants in the case had been members of a group called the Death Angels whose purpose was "to start a race war."

During his 12 days on the stand, he testified that he had ridden around in a car with the defendants while some of the crimes were allegedly committed. There were contradictions in his testimony, which was given under a grant of immunity from prosecution.

Series of Street Killings

Four young men, all members of the Nation of Islam, are on trial, charged with three murders and four assaults that were among a random series of street killings that aroused the city two years ago.

The trial is called the "Zebra" case, after the name assigned to the special police radio band used in the search for suspects in a six-month period in which 14 persons were killed and seven were wounded.

The defendants are Manuel Moore, 31 years old; J. C. X. Simon, 29; Larry C. Green, 23, and Jessie L. Cooks, 30.

Last week, Robert Podesta, the Assistant District Attorney who presented the state's case, said that the sole motivation for the killings had been race. "The main object was to kill people, not to take anything, but to kill because they were white," he said.

Evidence Termed 'Clear'

Mr. Podesta, during his argument, emphasized that none of the "Zebra" crimes committed between Oct. 20, 1973, and April 16, 1974, had occurred on either Wednesday or Friday nights or Sunday afternoon. This was a reference to trial testimony that the Nation of Islam Mosque No. 26, to which the defendants belong, holds services at those times that they had normally attended.

New Policy on Retarded Reduces Number of State School Patients

By RONALD SMOTHERS
Special to The New York Times

ALBANY, Jan. 17—The department was $346.9 million compared with $247.8 million in the previous year. The bulk of the increase came from court-mandated improvements in the condition staffing, per-patient cost and programs in the development centers.

Although the total number of institutionalized patients was 6,300 fewer than in 1970, the reports said costs are increasing. The increases grow out of the Willowbrook decree, a court decision resulting from a legal challenge of overcrowding, unhumane treatment and understaffing at Staten Island's Willowbrook State School.

The new standards set down by the decree, as well as the release policy adopted by the state as a result of the case, are now being applied statewide, and adding to the increase in costs, the report said.

Goal Is Threatened

According to Dr. Bernard Geizer, who headed the commission study, the lack of services lessens the chances that the new state policy will accomplish its goal of eventually making the patients independent of the publicly financed department services.

Of those studied, 25 percent left the institutions with some pre-planned program of services. By the end of the study period, only 47 percent of all of the retarded patients had taken advantage of available services.

Since the start of the study, state law has required written pre-release service plans for all patients. The study found that the department's system had "bogged down" in this area because of a lack of community-based programs to provide services. Stringent requirements of the law were also an obstacle, the study found.

Costs Are Studied

A spokesman for the Department of Mental Hygiene, who declined to comment on the general findings of the study, conceded that officials were having problems meeting pre-release planning requirements. He said that a new office of special rehabilitation had been set up within the department to speed the release policy and set up better contacts with local social service departments to provide outpatient services.

Another aspect of the report dealt with the costs of the new policy of "normalization"—releasing the retarded to community set settings—and found that the costs of the

Churches Open Unity Week

The 68th consecutive observance of the annual Week of Prayer for Christian Unity will begin today in churches in this country and overseas. Started in 1908 by the Friars of the Atonement at Graymoor, Garrison, N. Y., the week has continued as a "permanent dialogue of spirituality," expressing "what should happen during the whole year." The prayer week is sponsored jointly by the Graymoor Ecumenical Institute and the National Council of Churches.

While the United States and the Bahamas are still technically discussing the fishing prohibition, United States officials say that Nassau considers lobster fishing by foreigners in the Bahamian waters "a dead issue."

"The Government and the fishermen are united in not wanting foreigners to exploit what they regard as their natural resource," one American official said. "Besides, the law is practically the same as the law that protects American lobster off the coast of Maine."

Massachusetts Charts New Course for Publicly Supported Higher Education

By GENE I. MAEROFF
Special to The New York Times

BOSTON, Jan. 13—A publicly supported system of higher education that was allowed to grow with little planning or coordination is now the subject of a major controversy in Massachusetts.

This state, a bastion of private colleges and universities, only lately has developed the public sector. Now Massachusetts is struggling to chart a course for the tax-supported institutions, and reorganization of some sort seems likely.

But there is considerable disagreement over whether all the public institutions should be merged into a single university or be allowed to remain separate, over the degree of selectivity that should exist for student admissions and over where control of the public sector should be vested.

These are issues that have been faced in most other major states, but Massachusetts, with its traditionally heavy reliance on the nonpublic sector of higher education, has paid scant attention to establishing policy for the public colleges and universities.

Influence of Political Structure
Adding to the difficulty of dealing with the problem is the power structure of Massachusetts politics with its large number of special interest groups and the sagging financial fortunes of many of the private institutions, which have more than a passing interest in what becomes of the public sector.

"We're the Johnny-come-lately in public higher education," said Dr. Robert C. Wood, president of the 33,589-student University of Massachusetts. "We have come into a territory that the privates have had as their domain for 300 years. 'Just a few years ago,' he continued, 'this university was Massachusetts Aggie [Agricultural] with 4,000 students and one campus. The state colleges were teacher-training institutions and the community colleges didn't exist."

What has brought the higher educational question to the fore now is legislation proposed by Kevin B. Harrington, president of the state Senate, to merge the University of Massachusetts with the 10-campus state college system.

Advocates a Merger
Mr. Harrington, a Democrat who has been the architect of several key higher educational bills, views a merger as the foundation for a unitary, state-supported system, somewhat like that in New York. He said that he would eventually like to see all of the public higher educational institutions in Massachusetts in a single system.

"Without reorganization," Mr. Harrington said, "there will be further fragmentation, increasing duplication" and an ultimate decline in the quality of public education.

There were 147,216 full-time and part-time undergraduate and graduate students enrolled in Massachusetts public colleges and universities last year.

Statement Stirs Controversy
They attended the three campuses of the University of Massachusetts, 10 autonomous state colleges, 15 community colleges and two recently created institutions—the University of Lowell and Southeastern Massachusetts University.

Private colleges and universities in Massachusetts enrolled 200,971 students last year. They attended 80 schools including such national institutions as Harvard, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Wellesley and Amherst, such large schools as Northeastern and Boston universities and dozens of smaller colleges.

Perhaps the most heated discussions generated by Mr. Harrington's merger proposal centered on his assertion that the measure could mean the upgrading of the academic level of the public sector and the weeding out of "so-so students" from the four-year institutions.

Commenting on this remark in an interview, Mr. Harrington said that "all heck broke loose over the phrase."

"All I was trying to say" he went on, "was that we had just finished a budget battle that cut 5 to 10 percent from each institution and that if we continue to face that kind of thing some students might unfortunately be cut out. If students are to be cut, it would have to be the lower academic achievers."

Gov. Michael S. Dukakis and Paul Parks, his education secretary, have rejected the Harrington proposal as "elitist."

"We now have diversification and I don't want something enormous and impersonal," Mr. Parks said. "There should be access to a four-year degree institution for anyone who wants it, regardless of the students level of academic preparation—although that doesn't mean he will necessarily stay in college."

Mr. Parks added, "is that all over the country people are moving toward an elitist position in education. I want to keep that from happening in Massachusetts."

In addition to the problem of access to education, there remains that of where the authority should rest for administering any reorganized system of higher education.

There is a Board of Higher Education that was established in 1965, but it has no direct fiscal or governmental authority. Its planning offices remained empty for two years for lack of funds to fill the position.

coordination is that each of the five sectors in public higher education—the university, the state colleges, the community colleges and the two newer universities has its own board of trustees and there is no requirement that one board consult with another.

"There is definitely a need for some kind of reorganization," said Dr. Leroy Keith Jr., who became chancellor of the Board of Higher Education in November. "The problem is that although the Board of Higher Education has a legislative mandate its clout has been very dubious because of the lack of staff and resources and no clear delineation of authority."

Philadelphia Wants to Use Expressway as Parking Lot

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 17 (AP)—The city wants to use an unopened stretch of Interstate 95, the Delaware Expressway, for parking for the estimated 10 to 20 million tourists expected to be in the city this summer to visit historic sites during the Bicentennial observance.

Hill Levinson, city managing director, told a group of downtown residents on Monday that the plan was "an intelligent approach" to cutting down traffic congestion on the city's narrow downtown streets.

The plan calls for 3,000 cars to be parked between Catherine Street and the Walt Whitman Bridge. Tourists would then be taken by bus to Independence National Historic Park.

DOWN WITH SUCCESS

Our headline for this special purchase bears a distinct note of ambivalence due to the fact that our ad for this down jacket (N.Y. Times 12/7/75) could almost be described as "too successful." At that time we knew that offering a $70 jacket of prime northern down for $39.95 was a great value, but we hardly anticipated 13,000 orders for our 10,000 jackets. Fortunately, we were able to spot the overwhelming response early enough to start a new production run on the jackets and we are now able to offer this great value again.

If you were disappointed and didn't place an order the first time, please come in or call again, since over 10,000 down jacket owners will assure you that it was well worth the wait. And, if you missed the first ad, the following facts should assure you that you shouldn't miss this great value again.

This parka is all-American made with 10% ozs. of prime northern down which is the lightest and best insulator known because it features breathability, resilience and durability that give it twice the comfort range of any other insulator. These professionally acclaimed properties of down, plus the quality of its craftsmanship, durable nylon shell and design features such as a freeze-resistant zipper, snapfront storm flap, down-lined pockets and a down-lined insulated hood—make this the best parka available for all your sporting activities. It's in navy only and suitable for men or women in men's sizes XS, S, M, L (10-3995). And, remember, it's a $70 value for just $39.95. Eighth floor. Call 24 hrs. a day (212) 682-0900. Mail P.O. *Due to availability of fabric, the new production run is in navy only (the most popular of the five colors originally offered). If you originally ordered the jacket in navy, it should be on its way to you. If you originally ordered it in one of the other colors, please let us know if you would like it in navy.

Albany Seeks Methods to Defer $4 Billion in Spring Borrowing

Republican and Democratic aides here said in interviews last week that these payments might be postponed until later in the year, perhaps until after the state's fiscal year ends on June 30. Their worry is that, if the state cannot borrow the money, it cannot advance the billions of dollars in aid to counties, cities and school districts all across the state—and that these localities might, in turn, default on borrowing obligations they had been intending to meet with state funds.

As a result, there has been a quickening of recent activity in the Capitol, as well as bipartisan discussions among Democratic and Republican staff members, to devise alternatives to the $4 billion borrowing "bludge" for which preparations must begin within the next month.

For example, the state has followed the practice of making its annual contribution to the two pension funds, the state teachers and state employees retirement systems, at the beginning of its fiscal year. This practice has meant that the state has had to borrow the money in the spring and then repay it as its revenues came in during the course of the year.

Next spring, the two systems are due to receive $825 million in payments. This practice has meant that the state has had to borrow the money in the spring and then repay it as its revenues came in during the course of the year.

Next spring, the two systems are due to receive $825 million in payments. Republican and Democratic aides here said in interviews last week that these payments might be postponed until later in the year, perhaps until after the state's fiscal year ends on June 30. Their worry is that, if the state cannot borrow the money, it cannot advance the billions of dollars in aid to counties, cities and school districts all across the state—and that these localities might, in turn, default on borrowing obligations they had been intending to meet with state funds.

Localities, including New York City, have a fiscal year that runs from July 1 to June 30. In 1969, former Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller and the State Legislature came up with the idea of state revenue sharing for localities—a boon, among other things, to the then New York City Mayor John V. Lindsay, whom Mr. Rockefeller was supporting for re-election.

But because there was no money in the state budget that year, Mr. Rockefeller promised to appropriate it in the subsequent fiscal year, beginning April 1, 1970, which, nevertheless permitted the city to use the money for its 1969-70 fiscal year, ended June 30, 1970.

The same three-month fiscal year overlap has meant that in the following year for use by a locality, in the current year, through the three-month "magic window" in Mr. Goldmark's words, the state has thus been able to push three-quarters of its annual school aid, its entire revenue-sharing program, as well as several smaller aid programs, including the municipal overburden program to Syracuse, Rochester, Yonkers and Buffalo last year.

But the practice has also left the state little flexibility in its ability to postpone the payments. Most localities—New York City is the prime exception—have borrowed money in anticipation of their receipt, and any postponement would offset their own credit timetables.

One other problem is the ability of the state to pay its spring pension pay this year. To deal with his fiscal headache—the $2.5 billion long-term rescue of the state's pension system—Governor Carey has called for a new mechanism to "integrate" the state's pension payments with the money for purchase of notes and issued by these agencies.

The "intercept" idea was forward to circumvent the position of State Comptroller Levitt to the investment pension money in bonds by any of the agencies, borrow only on the "general obligation" to state pension payments, then the money not be there to "intercept" Governor Carey would without funds to bail or agencies, which are three monthly with default.

"The two ideas are going to run head on into each other," Mr. Levitt said. "If it comes to a choice, I think the first order of business is to postpone the payments. Most localities—New York City is the prime exception—have borrowed money in anticipation of their receipt, and any postponement would offset their own credit timetables.

7 LIBRARIES SHUT BY FISCAL CRISIS

Residents Protest Closing of Facilities in City

Seven public libraries were added yesterday to the casualty list of public facilities such as firehouses and police stations that have ceased operation because of the city's fiscal problems.

But even as the doors of the seven libraries in Manhattan and the Bronx were being closed, New Yorkers made last-minute efforts to keep them open.

On the steps of the main Public Library at 41st Street and Fifth Avenue, nine city officials gathered to urge support for proposals introduced by two City Councilmen from Manhattan, Henry J. Stern, a Liberal, and Robert F. Wagner Jr., a Democrat. The legislation would allow library operations to continue at the affected branches.

"I'm absolutely certain that the libraries could continue to operate in some manner, if the board listens to reason," Mr. Stern said. He was referring to the board of directors of the New York Public Library, which ordered the shutdown last Monday.

School Officials in State Expect More Labor Strife During 1976

He also said that his organization had notified Governor Carey that "over school districts are going to have to have an increase in state aid if he expects to have quality education in the state."

Looking backward, Dr. Thomas E. Joyner, director of research at the Public Employment Relations Board, said that in the early days of the Taylor Law, which was passed to help settle labor disputes in the public employment sector of the economy, it was not unusual for school boards to put their final offers into effect and have teachers accept them.

"That doesn't happen any more," he said.

In those early years dating back to 1968, Dr. Joyner added, his board got involved in about 30 percent of all public-employee negotiations, including teachers. The percentage of unions using the Public Employment Relations Board procedures has remained the same, but the use by teacher unions and school boards has "gone through the ceiling" to more than 70 percent, he added.

"P.E.R.B. is there to be used," Mr. Hobart said. "It does help bring about negotiations; it's part of the process."

In the board's tabulation of last year's strikes, it was reported that 73,134 teachers, including 68,000 in the New York City school system, were involved in 17 strikes. The report did not include the strike at the parochial schools of the Brooklyn Diocese, which does not come under the board's jurisdiction.

As a direct result of violating court orders in those strikes, 33 teachers served short jail terms. Among them were 13 from Nyack, 12 from Schenectady and 8 from Orchard Park, just south of Buffalo. Penalties against other teacher unions and leaders are pending.

Dr. Joyner attributed the rising militancy to basic economic reasons, but he also cited changes in state aid from Albany, inflationary pressures on both teachers and school boards and a growing acceptance by school boards that strikes are not always disastrous.

More 'Confrontation' Expected

"Strikes have become defensive," he added. "School boards have learned that, under penalty situations of strikes where teachers pay two day's salary for one day of strike, they can sometimes get money to pay for the settlement."

Mr. Hobart agreed that more "confrontation" seemed inevitable. He said his members recognized that the general economic climate posed problems in the forthcoming negotiations. But, he added, "with higher prices and a rise in the cost of living, there's no way we can where people can sit quietly and broaden their horizons."

Inside the 41st Street branch, 14-year-old Alicia Goldstein, who uses her library for school work and for "fun reading," said she thought the closings "shouldn't happen."

"It's very sad," she said. Paulose Peter, who came to New York University from India, to study for a Masters degree, said he used the library because he hoped someday to go back to India and teach English literature, his specialty.

"As a person who uses the libraries," he said, "I can tell you it would be a terrible blow."

Good Fiction Collection

At the branch itself, Peter Green, a graduate student, said he had been using the library for eight years.

"This is the only place around with a good collection of fiction," he said. "The place is usually full every day. Most of the people here are elderly, but students use it as well."

"The libraries are needed more than ever," said Elizabeth Lippoth, who has lived in the community since 1928 and is a retired librarian.

The other library branches involved in the shutdown are: Cathedral, 564 Lexington Avenue; Webster, 1465 York Avenue; Castle Hill, 2230 Cincinnati Avenue, the Bronx; Tremont, 1866 Washington Avenue, the Bronx; Huguenot Park, 904 Huguenot Avenue, Huguenot, S.I., and Princes Bay 6094 Amboy Road, Pleasant Plains, S.I.

Outlying Branches Neglected

At the 41st Street demonstration which was attended by Borough Presidents Percy E. Sutton of Manhattan and Robert Abrams of the Bronx, Mr. Stern also charged that the board of library's trustees was unjustly funneling money to the main branch at the cost of outlying branches.

"The management is devoting its time to making this branch a treasure chest," he said. They don't care about Van Cortlandt or Tottenville.

"For the great city of New York to think of closing down its libraries is unthinkable," said Mr. Abrams, adding that the libraries were "a refuge

State's Record 'Good'

Despite the gloomy statistics, Mr. Hinman of the School Boards Association said that the history of teacher-school board labor relations in New York was "rather good," compared with some other states.

"How would you like to be in Pennsylvania, with 500 school districts compared to our 750, where they had 56 strikes in the first week of school?" he asked. He also cited the example of Rhode Island, where there were 13 strikes in 40 school districts in the opening days of school.

However, Mr. Hinman predicted that things would probably worsen in New York this year because of an impending split between the two major teacher labor organizations, the United Teachers and the National Education Association, with a potential rivalry for membership. The United Teachers, with 218,000 members, is now voting on whether to withdraw from the N.E.A.

Undergraduates at Yale to Have Their 'F's' Recorded Once Again

Yale students have increased by more than a third in the last four years, to almost 43 percent of all grades given in the last spring term.

"The system is plainly dishonest," said Donald Kagan, a professor of history and classics.

But many students, as well as the Yale College Council, the student government organization, have opposed the restoration of "F's," as well as the introduction of another notation into the transcripts next fall—the "W," for withdrawing from a course after mid-term.

"The freedom to withdraw from or fail a course, without having it recorded, served as a safety valve and allowed a student to experiment in courses outside his chosen field," said Joseph Goffman, a senior who is chairman of the council.

And Randy Mastro, a sophomore on the council, said: "For the majority of students at Yale who care about their work, failing is punishment enough without it going on the public transcript."

Mr. Mastro got in touch with admissions officers at the other Ivy League graduate schools and reported that all but one told him the present Yale transcript was "fine."

But Dean Taft said that Jeroslav Pelikan, the dean of the Yale Graduate School, had also discussed the transcript situation with the deans of other graduate schools and had concluded that "our transcript would be more credible if 'F's' were recorded."

"And I think it's very important to produce a transcript that helps the most students, particularly since very few of our students get

"F's" anyway," Dean Taft said.

The restoration of failing grades to transcripts starting with next fall's semester will be the 13th revision of Yale grading practices in this century.

The 12th revision occurred last fall with the introduction of a plan to encourage course experimentation by allowing students to take two courses a year on a pass-fail basis. About 20 percent of Yale's students exercised the option, and school officials said the results were disappointing.

Inmate Sentenced to Death

An inmate at Western Penitentiary has been sentenced to death under Pennsylvania's new capital punishment legislation. Clifford Futch, 31 years old, was convicted June 27 of killing an inmate. He was serving a life sentence for a 1970

murder. Common Pleas Judge Joseph H. Ridge yesterday ordered execution at a time to be set by the Governor. Gov. Milton J. Shapp, although he opposes capital punishment, said he would uphold the new law.

A HUSBAND'S AFFAIR STIRS SUIT OVER JOB

OAKLAND, Calif., Jan. 17 (UPI)—Cheryl Crouse was monitoring telephone conversations as part of a test of phone circuits when she heard her husband make a date with another woman, she charges in a lawsuit.

She was so emotionally upset she continued to monitor calls from her husband's concern and because of this eventually lost her job with the telephone company, she charges in suing to win unemployment benefits that were denied her.

The suit filed in Alameda County Superior Court, is against the California Employment Development Department, which rules on unemployment benefits, and the Pacific Telephone Company.

The suit says that Pacific Telephone employees were testing trunk lines over a loudspeaker in 1974 and the calls were broadcast throughout the test room without any indication to callers that their conversations were being monitored.

"Petitioner heard the voice of her husband broadcast over the loudspeaker," Mrs. Crouse's suit said. "He was in the process of making a date with another woman [petitioner] became extremely distraught. She was unable to control her actions and she began to monitor the phone lines of her husband's place of work."

She was caught and dismissed on Jan. 18, 1975, and applied for state unemployment benefits, but they were denied.

Beame Is Still Wielding Power Despite State Fiscal Control

By FRANCIS X. CLINES

One month after deliverance by Federal loans from the menace of default, Mayor Beame rules in a City Hall remarkably unchanged by the concern and hysteria of the immediate past.

Where some critics were expecting an administrative revolution, the Mayor has shifted a few key aides to new positions, and greater change is still in the planning and promise stage.

Where others expected political challenges and clear evidence of shrunken powers, the Mayor is finding resigned silence from the Board of Estimate and the City Council and not even the marginal carping of the past.

Where his patronage power used to be solely in bestowing positions on favored politicians, the job portfolio has been cramped, not eliminated. However, he exercises a new kind of negative patronage in deciding which of the political cadres survives the job ax.

And while state overseers set the overall budget limits for the city, the Mayor is now busy deciding all the countless budget details, including who does business with the city.

He has been given new authority to bring the City University and hospital budgets into line. And officials in Governor Carey's administration are mindful of Mr. Beame's as yet untested Albany power—his ability to influence votes in the Democratic controlled Assembly.

state officials point to two individuals as the chief guarantors that the city will not be permitted to slip back to wastrel habits.

The first is John E. Zuccotti, the popular and respected former City Planning Commission chairman chosen by Mr. Beame to be the new First Deputy Mayor.

The other is Herbert Elish, the former Lindsay administration official drawn from his post at Citibank at the height of the crisis to be the sort of union-wise and banking-wise executive needed by state officials in their attempt to arrange the city's fiscal rescue.

Close to Zuccotti

Mr. Zuccotti can be seen every day at City Hall, working furiously in his task of trying to translate the dollar cuts into job and service cuts that let the city survive. So far, no one is saying that Mr. Beame is denying close support of his new chief deputy—a relationship that is causing favorable comments from outside critics.

Just as Mr. Beame's closeness with Mr. Zuccotti's predecessor, James A. Cavanaugh, once sparked fiscal notoriety.

But a basic, as yet unanswered question, is how far Mr. Zuccotti's talents can be stretched.

John Zuccotti is an extraordinarily capable and sensitive administrator," said Felix G. Rohatyn, chairman of the Municipal Assistance Corporation.

"But I think you need 50 Zuccottis, at all kinds and levels of city agencies, if the city is to make it. There is an illusion that the city is far the worst of it, but this is far from certain and it will depend on the competence of city management."

Mr. Zuccotti himself responds that there are a dozen study groups looking into various aspects of managerial reform, as well as a new talent searching panel to find new chiefs for the Human Resources and Transportation Administrations.

He says Mr. Beame is leading the push for managerial reform and such changes as the shift of a Beame trouble-shooter, Anthony T. Vaccarello, to be Commissioner of Sanitation, and the return of Victor Marrero from the Carey administration to be the new planning chairman are significant.

The Esposito Case

But cynicism remains, with some disgruntled politicians pointing to such situations as the survival of Gerald V. Esposito, a party worker whose job as deputy commissioner of Marine and Aviation was eliminated in one austerity step but who was hired soon after as an aide to the City Council.

A mayoral aide insisted Mr. Esposito was too talented to be dismissed, and that his survival was the exception not the rule in the case of dismissed appointees.

Many politicians, at both the city and state level, have been estimating lately that the task of Mr. Elish as the Emergency Control Board's man at City Hall is an impossible one from the outset.

They cite such factors as the alien terrain of the city administration and the absence of a definition of his job either by law or by some dramatic sign from the state Control Board, which has, in fact, been disowning any intention of meddling on the day-to-day details dear to any good administrator.

Mr. Elish, however, says he has been more than willing to define his role on the job. And he has been maintaining a close contact with the source of his power—David Burke, the Governor's secretary, who had Mr. Elish up to his Albany home for a visit last weekend. His first move will be to form a small staff of about 10 fiscal and governmental analysts to give him an independent perspective on the city's fiscal plan. This shift has begun with the arrival of Jay Holt, a lawyer, from the Governor's staff to the Elish operation.

One thing Mr. Elish emphasizes lately is that the municipal labor groups, having helped the city survive with more than $3 billion in pension funds, are "very significant financial partners" of the city.

In agreeing with him, Victor Gotbaum, executive director of District Council 37 of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, adds that one initial problem of the new city government structure is that of a "Yo-Yoing" of crucial decisions between the Central Board and City Hall.

"Herb and John [Zuccotti] have to build a relationship so that you get one response on an important question," he said. Of Mr. Elish's future, he added: "It's premature to discount Herb. There's a question of how much power he'll have, but he could play a big role."

Both Mr. Zuccotti and Mr. Elish say they are building a good relationship, and on certain key policy issues they do talk alike. For example, while the idea of reviving the city by somehow encouraging job development has already become something of a political cliché, both these administrators feel obliged to be cautious on the subject.

"The problem can't be solved in this building," Mr. Zuccotti declared at his City Hall desk. It is a complicated problem that the city can influence but one rooted in national and private corporate factors beyond New York's control, he asserted. "We're not going to fall into the same bag again," he went on. "What got us into this jam was the notion every problem could be solved by City Hall."

Mr. Elish also fears easy promises on job development because of such problems as the city's growing unskilled labor pool. "It's something I don't know the answer to," he said. "It's even more difficult than people think it is."

As the city government adjusts to its latest enforced lifestyle, that of cutting the budget, there are those who see the first signs of a new kind of politics evolving.

On a simple level, for example, the dismissal of various public relations appointees is coming to be viewed by some reporters as an opportunity for Sidney J. Frigand, the Mayor's press secretary and adviser, to centralize and better control the remaining public information apparatus.

On a policy level, there are members of the M.A.C.—Mr. Elish and other—saying that this first year's emphasis on relatively scaled across-the-board cuts avoided the politically troublesome problems of judging the quality of programs and possibly scuttling many wholesale Mr. Zuccotti says that his basic mission from the Mayor is, in effect, to see to the quality to spare the best parts of government as the city retrenches.

He said the new rule at City Hall was "the politics of scarcity."

Mayor Beame chatting with Maurice Ferrer, the Mayor of Miami, at the Amn Hotel Friday night. They met at a banquet given by the National Puerto Rican F.

'He Creamed Me'

Has the Mayor really lost power?

"No one wants to test whether he has, and that in itself is power," said City Councilman Matthew J. Troy, Democrat of Queens, the last prominent politician to test the Mayor, with disastrous results. "He's still in with the county leaders. Remember, I wondered about Beame's power two years ago and he creamed me."

"He's probably gained power," said Donna Shalala, treasurer of the Municipal Assistance Corporation, the emergency funding body that spent last summer trying to nudge the Mayor toward change as the fiscal crisis struck. "Like most elected officials, he is an incrementalist. He has spent a lifetime closing gaps and yielding a little bit at a time, even when radical steps are required."

And for an incrementalist the new situation of having the state's Emergency Financial Control Board overseeing the city's budget limits is a handy relationship, one Beame and advisers raise questions about who is responsible for job cuts, wage freezes, service shutdowns and other aspects of austerity.

To the Precipice

So far, there has been relatively little public complaint that the Mayor has had to face at City Hall, for all the cutbacks. "It's not a bad situation for a politician," said a member of the Board of Estimate and friend of the Mayor. "A constituency has been quieted with the knowledge that they have been to the precipice."

"Abe Beame is emerging from this very well," said City Councilman Howard Golden, Democrat of Brooklyn. "He's in no worse shape than any other politician. This business about his power, I don't think Carey ever wanted to run the City of New York."

Aides to the Mayor, who obviously cannot afford to be viewed as a lame duck with the mayoral race approaching next year, say there is no reason—either his age or the crisis—to think he might not run.

"It would not surprise me at all if he ran," said Comptroller Harrison J. Goldin, Mr. Beame's party rival who was an early critic of the city's fiscal condition. Mr. Goldin has been more muted as a participant in the state's effort to rescue the city, but the Mayor's aides expect renewed criticism as the mayoral year nears.

No one knows the basic shape yet of the next mayoral contest, but several politicians are making the same ironic point voiced by Councilman Robert F. Wagner Jr., Democrat of Brooklyn, that Mr. Beame's strength might be "the illusion that he is powerless and therefore blameless in the public eye."

F.B.I. Censure Move Blocked

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 17 (UPI)—A seldom-used rule limiting Los Angeles City Council resolutions to matters directly involving the city was invoked yesterday to kill a resolution denouncing the Federal Bureau of Investigation for alleged harassment of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. The council president, John Gibson, invoked the rule to block the proposal, sponsored by the council's three black members, also called on the F.B.I. Congress and the Justice Department to apologize to Dr. King's widow.

Levitt Charges Waste by Service Age

By LINDA GREENHOUSE

Special to The New York Times

ALBANY, Jan. 17 — State Comptroller Arthur Levitt said today that the state had lost money because the Office of General Services, New York's "housekeeping" agency, was lax about keeping track of office-space needs and is slow to dispose of unneeded property.

For example, an audit report released by the Comptroller's office today disclosed that the Office of General Services was spending $273,000 a year to maintain a vacant former tuberculosis hospital that the Department of Health abandoned two years ago.

The agency also spent several hundred thousand dollars to maintain an unused state training school for girls between July 1971 and March 1975, when the property was auctioned for $301,000.

Asked for comment on the audit, a spokesman for the agency said his organization was required to accept property abandoned by other state agencies and sometimes decided to spend money on keeping up the property in order to protect its eventual value for future state use or sale.

had handled the leasing arrangements and placed this agency with two others that were moving into the building simultaneously, some $25,000 might have been saved, the report concluded.

"More Assertive Role"

"Since the concept of the Office of General Services is to centralize in a single agency all of the housekeeping tasks necessary to operate the state governments, O.G.S. should play a more assertive role," Mr. Levitt said in the report.

The agency's spokesman said that the organization had neither the financing nor the staff to act as an "enforcing agency" and that it could not force other state agencies to cooperate.

The report urged the agency to improve its record-keeping of needed or surplus office space and to dispose of unwanted property on a priority basis according to how much the property costs to the agency oversees 2 acres of state land million square feet space.

CANTERBURY ASKS BALANCE IN FAITH

Archbishop, on Visit Here, Urges Equal Concern for This World and Next

By KENNETH A. BRIGGS
The Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. F. Donald Coggan, making his first American visit since assuming office nearly a year ago, repeatedly underscored the need for the church to balance its concerns between a "this worldly" view of mounting crises and "that world beyond."
In one of his final appearances before returning to England last week, the slight, urbane 66-year-old prelate told a noontime congregation at Trinity Church that Christians must be "irrevocably committed" to the worsening problems of "sin, ignorance and disease" which he labeled "mankind's greatest enemies."
But, he added, "immersion in these problems" must be done within the "dimension of eternity" that proclaims "we are moving inexorably toward the judgment seat of Christ."
Dr. Coggan's main purpose for the brief three-day visit was to deliver a series of Trinity Institute lectures at Riverside Church. Between lectures he made stops at, among other places, the United Nations and the American Bible Society. He has visited the city several times before, but always in other capacities.

"The History is Awesome"
As the 101st holder of one of Christianity's most venerated offices—primate of Britain's 33 million-member Church of England as well as the recognized leader of the world's Anglicans—he is keenly aware of the ring of authority and tinge of royalty the title bears.
"The history is so awesome," he said in an interview. "Recently I took part in an observance of the anniversary of Thomas à Becket's murder, 805 years ago."
"Before the service, I walked the way Becket went, looked up at the very architecture he saw, stopped in the hall where he paused to warm himself, and then to the spot where," he went on, drawing a hand across his forehead, "they took his head off."
With all his knowledge of the history of the office, Dr. Coggan is convinced the position is undergoing change.
"There is a crisis of authority in Rome and in Canterbury," Dr. Coggan said calmly. "I don't think you can assume any more that because you're the Pope or the Archbishop you have an innate authority. It's tougher because you have to earn authority."
Various Opinions
In the interview, and at various points during his stay, Dr. Coggan, a courtly, cheerful man with a background in languages and Biblical scholarship, expressed opinions on a variety of subjects including women's ordination, which he favors, the growing chasm between rich and poor, about which he is alarmed, the conflict in Northern Ireland and the contributions of Eastern religions.
On the Northern Ireland question, the prelate said he would "gladly walk hand in hand with the Pope down the main street in Belfast if that would help." But he does not see that as the solution, nor does he see any easy answers.
At the American Bible Society, where he received the symbolic $50 million copy of the paperback edition of the New Testament, "Good News for Modern Man," Dr. Coggan elaborated on the growing perils to human existence.
"Divide Yawns Greater"
"The great divide between rich and poor yawns greater every year," he said. Overpopulation, starvation and "pollution of not only water and air but also of the mind grows more severe."
To combat pornography, one of Dr. Coggan's chief targets over the years, he proposed "flooding the world" with the kind of Biblical literature his Bible Society listeners help produce.
The church's efforts toward disseminating its message, said

Steer Donated to Zoo Is Sold for Slaughter
ALBUQUERQUE, N. M., Jan. 17 (UPI)—Tom Black donated his pet longhorn steer to the Rio Grande Zoo. He was appalled to learn that it had been sold for slaughter.
Mr. Black said that he donated the steer to the zoo two and a half years ago and was told he could reclaim it at any time. However, the zoo's veterinarian, Bruce Stringer, said that such a promise had never been made, since a Department of Agriculture regulation prohibited the return of domestic animals that were placed in zoos.
Zoo officials said that they had decided to send the steer to the slaughterhouse because it had become "mean," and no other facilities were available.
"The steer was no longer part of the collection of the zoo, and it was attacking people," said Fred Goodman, the director.

Five in Family Die in Fire

Woman Hurt in Stabbing Improves
Improvement was reported yesterday in the condition of Barbara Porter, who was taken to Lincoln Hospital Friday with critical wounds suffered when she was stabbed by an assailant who tried to seize her purse as she was walking with her infant daughter on a Bronx street. The suspect, Sylvan Font, 36 years old, also of the Bronx, was arrested after he was apprehended by pedestrians. A spokesman at the hospital described Mrs. Porter's condition as stable.

Burglars Break Into Post Office
Burglars broke a rear window of the Van Brunt Post Office at 275 Ninth Street, in the Park Slope section of Brooklyn during the night and stole an estimated total of 100 packages. The police said the burglar alarm had been disconnected because of construction work. The value of the stolen packages could not be immediately determined.

2 Guilty in Flood-Loan Scheme
A Federal jury has convicted two men and acquitted a third of a conspiracy charges stemming from a scheme to obtain $702,000 in loans for flood damage assessed at only $225,000 in Pennsylvania. The five-day trial in Federal Court here ended in the convictions of Robert Geffen, 55 years old, an accountant of Port Chester, N.Y., and Gene L. Simms, 44, a realtor of Darien, Conn. Ernest Kassab, 52, of Fort Lee, N.J., was acquitted. The charges related to flood damage to a shipping center at Huntington, Pa., by Hurricane Alice in June 1972. The defendants were accused of scheming to obtain the loans through the State of Pennsylvania and the Federal Small Business Administration.

Connecticut Building Permits Rise
Connecticut home-building permits have increased substantially in the last year, according to the state's Commerce Commissioner, Edward J. Stockton. Permits have been running at an annual rate of 12,300 in the last year, compared with 9,800 in 1974, Mr. Stockton said. Building permits are usually an early sign of construction activity and an indication of what the housing industry can expect in the spring, he asserted.

An empty lead pipe was found in the bushes at the United Nations Plaza and 43d Street yesterday a person identifying himself as a member of the Jewish Armed Resistance called The New York Post to say a bomb had been put there. Early Friday morning, a pipe bomb exploded outside the Polish Consulate at Madison Avenue and 38th Street. No one was injured and damage was slight.

4 Robbers Get $6,000 at Discotheque
Four men, one armed with a shotgun, and another with an automatic pistol, held up the Leviticus Club, a discotheque at 45 West 33d Street at 2:30 A.M., and escaped with more than $6,000. A club spokesman said the robbers escaped from the rear as the police appeared at the front entrance. Emergency service policemen, armed with shotguns and wearing bulletproof vests, were sent to the scene after a report that shots had been fired and hostages taken. The spokesman said the reports were unfounded.

1976 BUDGET PASSED BY PORT AUTHORITY
The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey has approved a 1976 budget calling for the expenditure of $224 million for construction projects, $336 million for daily operations and $180 million for bonds.
A third of the construction allocations are for bus and transit projects, some of which are still dependent on Federal approval.
Construction projects in the budget include development work at Newark International Airport, $17 million; parking-garage work at La Guardia Airport, $10 million; construction of specialize container facilities and new development at the Elizabeth-Port Authority Marine Terminal, $12 million; a start on the expansion of the Midtown bus terminal, $20 million; replacing the upper level roadway of the George Washington Bridge, $11 million; improvements to PATH transit system, $12 million; design work on expanding PATH, $17 million; World Trade Center projects, $77 million, including $11 million for food service facilities and $5 million for television transmitting antennas on the roof, and Kennedy International Airport rail link design work, $19 million.

Church Asks Punishment. For Naming C.I.A. Aides
PITTSBURGH, Jan. 17 (AP)—Criminal sanctions should be imposed against former Central Intelligence Agency employees who reveal the names of agency sources or agents active abroad, Senator Frank Church, chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, said here today at a news conference.
Mr. Church said he would urge his committee to include a recommendation for sanctions in its final report to the Senate.
Philip Agee, a one-time C.I.A. agent, said in Rome earlier this month that he and other critics of the agency would expose the names of agents in Spain, France, Italy and other countries.
Senator Church said "the C.I.A. needs a stronger means for dealing with the problem of former employees like Philip Agee, who revealed such information."

Custody by Fathers Backed
Eighty-two percent of the Americans polled in a survey said they approved of a father's retaining custody of his children in a divorce settlement. Only 15 percent felt the mother should always win custody, says Barbara Arback of the research department of the Life Insurance Institute.

CARDINAL COOKE GIVES TO NEEDIEST

Cites Unprecedented Crisis in Aiding 64th Appeal

A personal contribution for $250 has been received from Terence Cardinal Cooke for the 64th annual appeal of the New York Times Neediest Cases Fund.
His gift was accompanied with a letter in which he wrote: "During this season all New Yorkers are acutely aware of the plight of the lonely aged, the poor and disabled. With each new announcement of cutbacks in human services, they see more avenues of help being closed to them.

Recorded yesterday $5,013.53
Previously acknowledged $851,502.07
Total $856,515.60

"This year they face a crisis of truly unprecedented proportions. They need the assistance of the voluntary agencies supported by your annual appeal more now than at any time since the great Depression."
"I pray that a special blessing of this season will be a resurgence in our hearts of that volunteer spirit that brings neighbor to the side of neighbor in love and service."

Belated Gift
Virginia Creede of Manhattan said she was sorry to be tardy with her gift of $25, "but I am sure you will agree, better late than never."

Out-of-town supporters of the Neediest Cases continue to provide help, such as Kathryn Neisius of Madison, Wis., who sent a check for $100.

An anonymous contributor gave $2,500 in memory of Adolph S. Ochs, Effie Wise Ochs, Arthur Hays Sulzberger and Orville E. Dryfoos. Mr. Ochs was publisher of The Times in 1912 when he established the Neediest Cases Fund; he was succeeded by Mr. Sulzberger and Mr. Dryfoos as publishers.
Yesterday's donors totaled 264, who gave $5,013.53 to the year's appeal. The total received by the fund from 9,335 contributors now stands at $856,515.60.

Requests Are Deductible
The annual campaigns have aided thousands of men, women and children throughout the metropolitan area. Donations to the fund may be made anonymously, in the name of the donor or in memory of someone else. Gifts and requests are deductible for income-tax and estate-tax purposes, and all administrative expenses are borne by The Times.

A reader, Alan E. Rosen of Park Ridge, N.J., wrote: "Enclosed is a $10 check to be used any way you see fit. While eating breakfast this morning, I happened to see the article on the fund and decided, 'Why not?'"
College undergraduates here and on campuses in many areas have always shown awareness of the problems facing others without many of life's necessities. Ann Epstein, a business student at Columbia University, sent $5 and said: "I'll probably make more money in the future than I'll give more."

Ambrose Channel Closing July 4 for Operation Sail

By WERNER RAMBERGER

For the first time in this century Ambrose Channel will be closed to peacetime ship traffic and no commercial vessels will be allowed to enter or leave the port between 5 A.M. and 4 P.M. on July 4. This unusual step is being taken by the Coast Guard, along with a number of other measures, to discharge its responsibility for the local Fourth of July activities.
These include a review of naval ships anchored along the New York and New Jersey shore from the George Washington Bridge to the Verrazano-Narrows Bridge. The review is to be followed at 10 A.M. that day by the Operation Sail 1976 parade on the Hudson River to the Spuyten Duyvil Bridge. The 18-mile parade is expected to take six hours to complete.
An attendance of more than 200 craft, including a dozen "tall ships"—United States and foreign naval training vessels—is expected by Operation Sail 1976 managers, who have been planning the event for a long time.
Federal responsibility for the event is not confined to the Coast Guard. It also involves the Customs Service and the Immigration and Naturalization Service.
Customs is circulating a special seven-page memorandum to tell persons involved about "border formalities" for the large number of foreign ships and just what Customs forms will be required to admit marine visitors from abroad to the country for participation in the event.
And an Immigration spokesman said last week that it was likely that a number of temporary inspectors would have to be hired to verify the travel documents held by several thousand foreign mariners.
Other Coast Guard traffic rules for the day include closing the Hudson River for nine hours to commercial shipping from the Battery to Spuyten Duyvil and the closing of Upper Bay to commercial shipping for a six-hour period.

Ambrose Channel, which was completely closed to shipping in peacetime for nonaccident reasons; it was closed repeatedly during World War II to permit the sailing of convoys.
The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey last week issued the 1976 edition of the Port of New York-New Jersey Scheduling Steamship Service Directory.
The 21-page booklet, designed to meet the needs of exporters, importers, freight forwarders and other business organizations, lists names, addresses, telephone numbers and pier locations for all lines and agents offering regularly scheduled cargo, passenger and cruise service from the port.
Copies of the directory may be obtained without charge from the agency's Port Promotion Division, Room 63 South, One World Trade Center, New York, N.Y. 10048.

A total of 15,455 merchant ships entered and left the port in 1975; the Maritime Association of the Port of New York reported last week.
Last year's vessel traffic, made up of 7,841 arrivals and 7,614 sailings, fell 1.254 ship movements below 1974 when a total of 16,709 vessels arrived and sailed.
The decline in ship movements, it was explained, was primarily due to the continuing trend toward faster and larger vessels, which are more productive than the tonnage used in the 1960's when annual vessel traffic volume was above the 20,000 mark.

Teething Rings, Pacifier Are Recalled by F.A.A.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 15 (AP)—The recall of three types of teething rings and one brand of candy pacifier for infants and small children has been announced by the Food and Drug Administration.
Reliance Products Corporation of Woonsocket, R.I., said it had voluntarily undertaken a recall of the teething rings to avoid any question as to the safety of the products.
"However, no tests undertaken up to this time have proven any of the products to be a health hazard," the company said.
The F.D.A. said the water-filled teething rings contained an ammonium compound that did not inhibit bacterial growth and could cause vomiting if punctured.
The types involved are the Nuk Orthodontic Gum Soother, Assorted Protect-O-Cool Soother and Protect-O-Cool Ring Soother.
About 11,520 Charm Fun Candy pacifiers being recalled were imported from Belgium by Dae-Julle Inc., Chicago, and distributed in California and Pennsylvania. The F.D.A. said they could break and cause choking.

NEW! DISPOSABLE DOGGIE DIAPERS

Dear Public:
Your response to our introductory advertisement has been overwhelming. Am so pleased my revolutionary invention, "Doggie Duty Dydies" is helping ease your dog walking chores, especially during this bitter cold weather.
Now more than ever, during our bicentennial year when thousands of visitors from abroad are coming to our wonderful country, won't it be nice to show them how clean our city streets are—free from dog droppings. We will all finally be able to walk with our heads up—instead of our heads down, to avoid stepping into a mess.
Even "Fido" will be happy not to go out in the bad weather.
We are considering making our diapers in a red, white and blue motif as a tribute to our bicentennial, so people will know instantly when they take your dog out a few times to train him (as per instructions), you are doing your patriotic duty to help clean the streets of your city. Let know if you like the idea.
"Doggie Duty Dydies" are also marvelous to train your new puppy to "go" indoors from puppyhood on. For puppies order Toy size.
For those of you who have already sent in their orders we are feverishly busy filling them as quickly as possible. Do bear with us under this avalanche. Many thanks for your spontaneous acceptance of "Doggie Duty Dydies". I am just delighted,
Sincerely,

HOUSE DELAYS VOTE ON AID TO ANGOLA

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17 (AP)

House leaders, predicting that Congress will stop United States aid to factions fighting in Angola, have decided to delay a final vote on the issue so the cutoff will not occur, while Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger is in Moscow.
The final House vote on a cutoff now is scheduled for Jan. 27.
The vote will be on final Congressional approval of a $112.3 billion defense appropriation bill to which the Senate has tacked a rider prohibiting any further United States aid to the Angola factions.
The House Appropriations Chairman, George H. Mahon, Democrat of Texas, said he scheduled the vote after talking with President Ford.
"It was felt by the President, and I am sure it was felt by the Secretary of State, that it could be desirable not to have this emotional issue come up while the Secretary is there" in Moscow, Representative Mahon said.
Mr. Kissinger is to meet with Soviet leaders in Moscow next week for discussion of arms limitation negotiations.

Meat Processors Ask To Use 'Banned'

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17 (AP)

The Agriculture Dept. is giving processors six months to use labels that violate a rule against using "pure" or "100 percent" meat and poultry containing more than one meat.
The regulation says that processors can't "purge" or "blend" frankfurters, though often contain such as curing agents.
The department said that the use of words like "pure" or "all beef" on labels, was issued by and took effect last week.
On Wednesday, more than two weeks after the regulation was issued, officials would be busy with the issue. July processors had "been" venturing to label their products.
The extension will allow labels purchased in 1975, officials said, to be used on labels bought after that date.

A Kissinger Party Sparkles With Art

By RITA REIF

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17—What may have been the most bipartisan receiving line at any of the Bicentennial celebrations here last night was formed at the State Department more or less by chance.

And Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger, who was responsible for Senator Hubert H. Humphrey's joining him to greet about 600 guests, was delighted at the raised eyebrows, shocked glances and giggles that the presence of the former Democratic Vice President and current foreign policy critic caused.

"I put him there," Secretary Kissinger chortled in explanation after the two had shaken hands, kissed cheeks and waved on the guests for more than an hour before bidding each other good-by when the Senator left.

Portraits of Patriots

Mr. Kissinger then reported that his "good friend" Mr. Humphrey had been meeting with him when the reception began. "So I just suggested he join us." The guests at the reception came from virtually every state in the Union and included more than a dozen descendants of the nation's founders.

Although Mr. Kissinger was

the host at the party held to show off several portraits of patriots, a couple of early American highboys and lowboys, which were carved here before the Declaration of Independence was signed and more than a crate full of sterling-silver tea wares, fragile porcelains, cut-glass candelabra and an ormolu-encrusted French clock, it was Clement Conger who was the hero of the evening.

Mr. Conger, whom Mr. Kissinger described good-naturedly as "the most ruthless man in the State Department," is the chairman of the Fine Arts Committee and the curator of both the Sitae Department and the White House, where museum-quality collections of period art and antiques have been assembled in recent years.

This year's affair was the 14th held annually to thank art and antiques lenders and donors and, incidentally, to request that they donate again. And because this is the Bicentennial year and because today is the 270th birthday of Benjamin Franklin, Mr. Conger decided to spread the appreciation over two days, with last night's celebration concentrating on John Quincy Adams and his heirs and today's event on the Franklin fete and a corporate namesake.

A Donation From Gulf

It was at the late-afternoon reception today, in fact, that Charles Andes, board chairman and chief executive officer of the Franklin Mint Corporation, presented the pastel portrait of Benjamin Franklin by Jean Baptiste Greuze to the State Department. But it was already hanging for all to see last night and was much admired by Attorney General Edward H. Levi and Mrs. Levi, after they had paused over an 18th-century A.American desk (they live with English Queen Anne, Mrs. Levi said). Less conspicuously placed was another corporate donation of a painting, from the Gulf Oil Corporation. That oil-on-canvas by Ferdinand Richardt, painted a century ago, is the "Niagara Falls" that now decorates Mr. Kissinger's reception hall.

Not all of the rarities were visible for all the guests to see. Martha Washington's desk, for instance, is in the ladies' lounge. That meant, for example, that every time the owner of that desk, Alice H. Warwick, a descendant of the Dandridge-forebears of Martha Washington, wished to see the historic heirloom she had grown up with, she dashed in to comb her hair.

On her way once to do just that, Mrs. Warwick paused by a vintage Chippendale secretary, the shelves of which groined with glistening silver wares. Here's Martha Washington's stop bucket," Mrs. Warwick observed, pointing out her loans. "But look, there's a more refined label on it—it reads 'waste bowl.'"

"Will I give Mr. Conger my Martha Washington mementos? I'm not certain. But I would like to set up a memorial for my mother, so maybe . . ."

Correcting the Record

Nobody spoke very much about Mr. Conger's ancestors. But when he was asked by a reporter whether he had any Martha Washington mementos to present, since it had been said he was a descendant too, Mr. Conger observed that he was delighted to correct the record on his forebears.

"No, I'm not a descendant of Martha Washington," he said firmly. But, he went on to explain, one of his ancestors is Sarah Ball, first cousin of Mary Ball, George Washington's mother.

The mother most discussed last night was not George Washington's but John Quincy Adams's, Abigail Adams. For one thing, the portraits of her son and daughter-in-law that had been painted 150 years ago were among the most discussed of the acquisitions. They now dramatize a wall in the John Quincy Adams State drawing room. For another, a namesake and descendant of hers—Abigail Homans, who with her brother, Robert, and her sister, Lily, gave the two portraits in memory of their late father, Robert Homans Sr.—was asked several times whether anyone ever found any family resemblance to that other Abigail.

"I certainly hope not," Miss Homans asserted firmly with a winking smile. The 20-year-old Radcliffe student's uncle, George Homans, who still owns John Quincy Adams dueling pistols, was also on hand for the festivities. Marion and Richard Wilder did not mingle much with the other guests. The couple seemed perfectly content to sit within touching distance of the Chippendale lowboy John Goddard carved and that Mrs. Wilder gave to the State Department a few years ago. The gift was made shortly after she was married to Mr. Wilder, a retired bill-board executive, who now divides his time between New York and Palm Beach. "Do you know we are both descendants of silversmiths?" Mr. Wilder asked. "One of my ancestors was Hiram

Future Social Events

By RUSSELL EDWARDS

Tickets to the following events may be obtained from the beneficiaries unless otherwise indicated:

Brilliance Sans Flash
Jan. 26—For its 17th annual round, the luminous non-parallel of the game (our old friend the Diamond Ball) has an apt and understated new name—the Winter Party. That's because it's now underwritten by "generous friends," nameless because they couldn't care less about limelight. Their concern is the Institute of International Education, which develops and administers cultural activities between the United States and more than 100 other countries. The party will take place in the Rainbow Room, and the names of diplomats and social, civic, governmental and industrial leaders will be on the seating list. Door prizes: a winter cruise, kindness of Carras; Jewelry from Bulgari, vanCleave & Arpels, Harry Winston and David Webb, and an evening dress from Dior. Everyone gets a Miami de N favor and dances to Michael Carney's music. Tickets, $150, by invitation only.

The Eagle Waltzes
Jan. 23—The Viennese Opera Ball, which benefits the Margit Bokor-Norman Scott Fund for Cancer Research at Columbia University, is the American premiere of Vienna's Opera Ball, one of the most important of the 204 dances held during the Fasching season (New Year's to Ash Wednesday), which keep Viennese dance shoes in good repair. The 21st annual at the Waldorf-Astoria is called "Austria Salutes the U.S.A.—the 150th Birthday of Johann Strauss." That's Johann the younger, the Waltz King, one of the three sons of the jealous Johann the elder, whom their mother sneaked off for secret music instruction. And as the young Strauss made a visit to Boston and New York in 1872, it's not stretching the eagle's wings too hard. The ball is always a long evening of pageantry, carefully chosen food, divertissements and fun. At 11 P.M., Johann Strauss medley will be sung on stage by members of the New York City Opera followed by a short ballet, "The Blue Danube." After midnight a Heuriger (Viennese wine garden) will open in the Jade Room with more food and wine, as well as dancing from Britain and music for as long as you hold out. Tickets, $70 or $135 a couple.

Wing of Another Feather
Jan. 23—At the 22d annual Antiques Show in the Seventh Regiment Armory one of the displays is a group of 18th-century furniture on loan from the American wing of the Metropolitan Museum of Art. The American wing is closed pending the completion of the new Bienenstein wing in the museum. Besides that, more than 60 national and international exhibitors will display their patinated acquisitions. At the preview, which benefits the East Side House Settlement, patrons, at $120 for a pair of tickets, will have the first special from 5 to 8:30 P.M. Then, general-admission ticket holders ($35 each) may enter, and all may alternate between shopping and hopping to Michael Carney's music until 9 o'clock. The show opens to the public next Saturday and continues through Feb. 1. Admission, $4.

Series and Serious
Jan. 21—When the sun hits the meridian don't just go out to lunch—feed your fund of knowledge, too. The first of four lectures called "Serious Talks for Busy People," benefiting the Harlem School of the Arts, will take place at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Nathan L. Halpern, 993 Fifth Avenue. Dr. Gertrude S. Hornung will talk on the art of Iran. The $5 tab includes a light lunch.

A Meeting of Colonists
Jan. 21—Two new colonies—Cape Cod, Mass., and Hohokam, Ariz.—have joined the National Society of New England Women, making a total of 35. Representatives from all of them will meet for the 51st annual founders day.

Patricia Humphreys Sets April 24 Bridal
Patricia Anne Humphreys, who is in the marketing and planning division of the Chemical Bank, plans to be married April 24 to A. Emerson Martin, 24, who is in the corporate finance department of Smith Barney & Company, investment bankers. The engagement has been announced by Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Humphreys of Hingham, Mass., whose fiancée is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Armour Emerson Martin of Fort Washington, L. I., and Rehoboth Beach, Del.

Luncheon in the Waldorf's Jade and Basildon Rooms.
Dr. Louis L. Tucker, executive director of the New York State Bicentennial Committee, will speak. Tickets, $15, from Mrs. Alex W. Mackenzie, 208 Inwood Avenue, Upper Montclair, N. J. 07043.

Pipes, Drums and Dancers
Jan. 22—One hundred and thirty soldier-musicians of the Royal Marines and the Black Watch, two of Britain's most celebrated military units, open a four-day stand at Madison Square Garden this night. Among the spectators will be a group of 150 members and guests of the Andrew's Society of the State of New York. The Scottish society's patrons will attend a preperformance reception in the Peas Plaza Club. Tickets, $22.50.

Interpreting Terpsichore
Jan. 22—A luncheon at the Harmonie Club will start off the 1976 "Exploration in the Arts" series given by the national women's division of the American Jewish Congress. The program "Invitation to the World of Dance," will feature American Ballet Theater with Vladimir Gelvan, a principal dancer of the company and a Soviet émigré, and Philippe de Coville, director of National Audience Development. This will be followed by a film featuring Fernando Buñones, Ballet Theater's youngest principal dancer. Tickets for both the luncheon and the second event of the series, on April 7, are $125.

It's All Clear
Jan. 24—The theme this year of the New York Cystic Fibrosis Foundation's Le Bal de la Neige is the crystal ball. It has nothing to do with clairvoyance or snow-storm paperweights—it just celebrates the 15th anniversary of the New York chapter. Phyllis and Burton Kosoff, who founded the chapter, will be honored as "woman and man of the year." Hal Linden of ABC-TV will receive the humanitarian award. The evening is expected to clear $50,000. Mrs. Richard Neuberger and Mrs. Lewis Steinman are chairmen. Tickets are $100 a couple, $125 for sponsor couples and $150 for patron couples.

Hindu Culture Evening
Jan. 24—India obtained its independence from Britain on Jan. 26, 1947, the date now known as Republic Day. The Hindu Cultural Society in Montclair, N. J., a nonprofit organization dedicated to preserving Hindu culture and heritage for persons of Indian birth and descent, will celebrate Republic Day with an evening of entertainment featuring classical and folk dancing of India and a Republic Day documentary film. The program takes place in the Kimberley School auditorium in Montclair, 7 to 10 P.M. Tickets are $3 from Arun Kantharia, 165 Franklin Street, Apartment 502, Bloomfield, N. J.

Three Legends to Meet
In a Squared Circle
Jan. 27—Cocktails, large kegs of beer, hot dogs, hamburgers, Southern fried chicken and spare ribs will set the gastronomic tone of a buffet dinner and amateur boxing gala at the Grand Ballroom of the Commodore Hotel to benefit the Easter Seal Society. There will be boxing bouts sponsored by the Amateur Athletic Union, and three persons qualifying for the title legends in their own time (which is also the title of the gala), the former heavyweight champions Jack Dempsey, Gene Tunney and Joe Louis, will receive awards from the society. James A. Farley Jr., State Athletic Commissioner, is dinner chairman. Tickets, $50 a person, $100 for ringside, from Frank H. Berend & Associates.

Hommage to Dr. Holloman
Jan. 27—The greater New York chapter of the National Foundation-March of Dimes will give its Service to Humanity Award to Dr. John L. S. Holloman Jr., president of the city's Health and Hospitals Corporation. Co-chairmen of the benefit are Dr. June Jackson Christmas, Helen Hayes, J. Bruce Llewellyn and former Mayor Robert F. Wagner. CITY U. REFERRING STUDENTS TO L.I.U.

In Fiscal Crisis, It Suggests 7,000 Apply to Other College

By EDWARD R. FISKE
City University, which is having difficulty finding funds to educate students it already has, is sending out letters to more than 7,000 entering freshmen suggesting that they consider enrolling instead at the Brooklyn campus of Long Island University.

The letter points out that although L.I.U. charges tuition, students at "certain family income levels" are eligible for state and Federal tuition subsidies. These could offset all or some of the additional tuition costs involved in attending a private institution.

David Newton, vice chancellor of L.I.U., said in an interview that the institution had received more than 900 responses to the City University letter and a related newspaper advertisement. "We expect to enroll several hundred [former City University] students this spring and more in the fall," he stated.

The idea of encouraging students to switch from the four-year colleges of City University to the L.I.U. Brooklyn Center was first proposed by the independent institution last fall before the City University announced that, because of its serious budget problems, it would not be able to admit new freshmen this spring.

Space Available

"We have facilities sufficient to accommodate 10,000 graduate and undergraduate students, including a new $12 million library and learning center," said Dr. Newton. "But right now we are only serving 5,000 students. The idea was to address student needs. We have this magnificent facility while C.U.N.Y. is busting at the seams."

Under the original proposal, the City University would have automatically enrolled all entering students who agreed to the idea at the Brooklyn Center. The Board of Higher Education reversed its decision not to accept entering students this spring, however, and the proposal was turned down.

Now, however, it has been revived and endorsed on a somewhat different basis. City University agreed to notify all entering students of the option to go to L.I.U. To do so, however, the students must make separate application and be accepted.

Dr. Newton said that the Brooklyn Center was willing to take up to 1,000 former City University students from families whose adjusted income was up to $10,000 and 500 more families with higher incomes.

On Basis of Income

The mathematics of the proposal revolves around the existence of the New York State Tuition Assistance Plan and the Federal Basic Educational Opportunity Program. These provide tuition subsidies to students based on family income and the cost of the institutions they attend. City University students do not qualify for the programs because they pay no tuition.

The letter, which is undated and signed simply "University Application Processing," points out that whereas tuition and fees at the Brooklyn Center are $2,700 a year, this additional cost can be covered "in whole or part depending on the level of family income" by public funds.

A student from a family with $9,000 adjusted income and three children, only one of whom is in college, would be entitled to up to $3,400 in combined state and Federal tuition assistance.

Dr. Newton, a former vice chancellor at City University, said that L.I.U. was also prepared to assist students through work-study programs and the university's own financial-aid program in making up any differences between tuition aid and the additional cost of attending the independent institution. The university, he said, is raising funds for this purpose.

Where to Write

The letter, which has been sent to all 7,300 students entering the four-year colleges of City University regardless of family income levels, advises students interested in transferring to the Brooklyn Center to write to Dr. Joram Warmond, director of admissions, or to call 834-6100.

Last fall 36 private colleges and universities in the metropolitan area proposed a much more ambitious plan whereby they would accept more than 23,000 low-income City University graduate and undergraduate students next fall. In return they asked for a contribution of $750—or half of the reported annual cost of educating a student at City University—from the city to help make up the difference between public tuition assistance and the receiving school's tuition and fees.

Alfred A. Giardino, chairman of the Board of Higher Education, said that this proposal was ingenious and cute but that the savings to the city would be minimal because it was based on "average" rather than "incremental" costs.

"The L.I.U. proposal," he said, "is much more fair."

Are All Sports Babblers Born to Lose?

By WILFRID SHEED

ever a profession seems to be sneered at, it soon announces. Although it has improved markedly in the past few years, I've talked with many who have noticed: Sports betting is a no-win enterprise because nobody knows what it is for.

In some instances, some viewers never get enough of "red zones" and "pullguards," while others even want to think about them. Then there's the problem: some fans seem like ketchups with their pleasures, while others find them as distasteful humor in pornography. A few snobs even fancy they'd prefer near-incest.

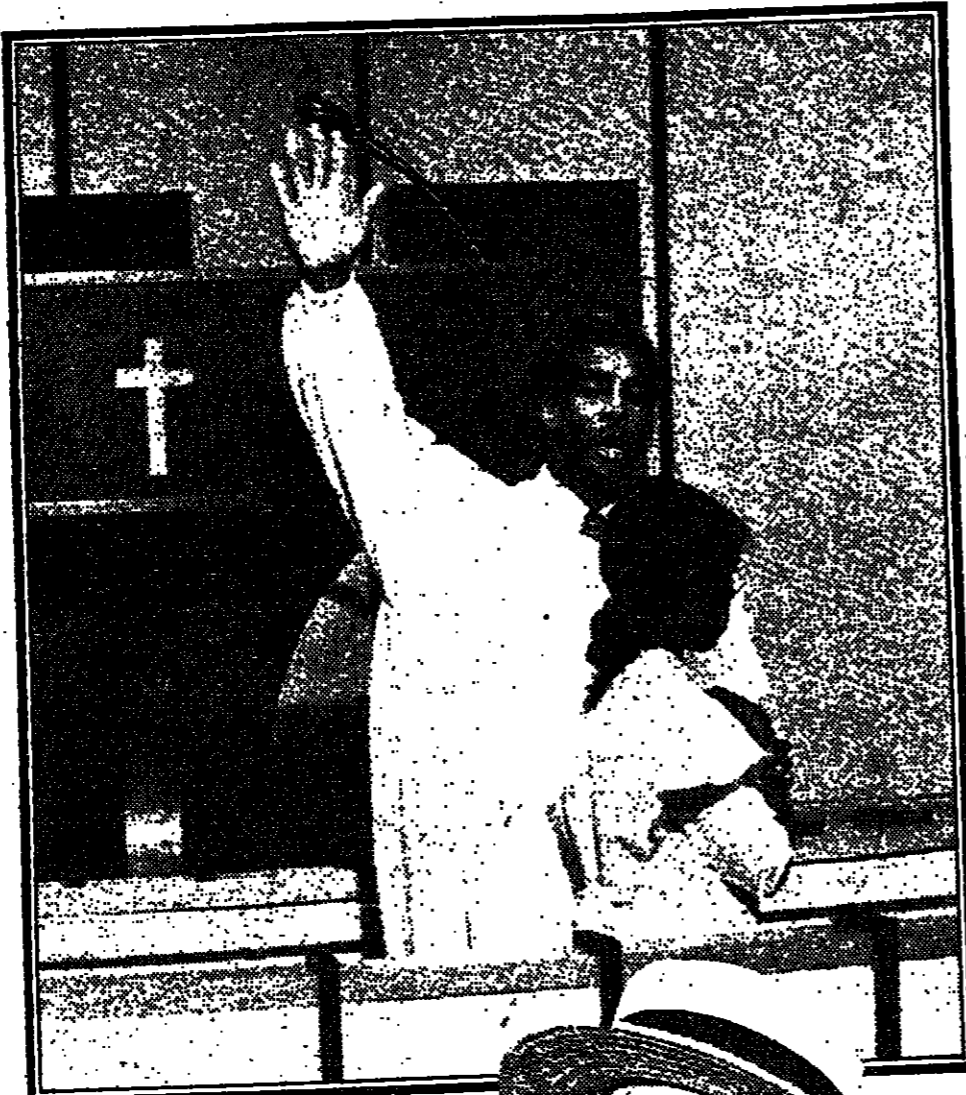

How can such a splayed profession be said to love or to go anywhere? For reasons of space (seasonal monomania with an eye to this noon's Super Bowl), I'll mostly to football here. In all, TV practically inverts the sport out of a few pastime played by untalented figures in mud and lavished its tenderest attention on it.

Today's standard football casting team consists of no more than three men in a booth—and here we do a bit of evolution from the old days, according to veteran announcer Jack Baker of CBS, the booth is now filled with people shoving paper at you. This, combined with the ceaseless bleat from the sound truck, is a coherent thought next to impossible. During that den age of the cliché in the air rang with "eat second efforts" and "game of inches" and "they're to play one leg at a time," you saw the phrases being said. What makes it so powerless to fend them off is the blinding monotony and the din of advice. Now at least the spotters have been bounced and hysteria has slackened to a roar. The two announcers are expected to spot for themselves. And while some of the football players who are still a bit slow of mind and furry of tongue to take up the

Why Hollywood Never Asks The God Question

In "Nashville," above, religion is used for our trivial amusement. The priests in "Going My Way" and "The Exorcist" seemed embarrassed by religion.

By ANDREW M. GREELEY

The good religious film has eluded the American industry. To be sure, there has been no shortage of spectaculars ("The Ten Commandments," "King of Kings," and Joan of Arc in various manifestations), to say nothing of Biblical sexploitations ("David and Bathsheba," "Samson and Delilah"), tear-jerkers ("Miracle of the Bells"), cloying chronicles of clerical culture ("Going My Way," "The Bells of St. Mary's," "Keys of the Kingdom," "Come to the Stable," "The Nun's Story"), ventures into the occult ("Heaven Can Wait," "The Exorcist"), and films with religious background for exotic effect ("Nashville," "A Woman Under the Influence"). American filmmakers have produced movies about religion, movies which use religion, movies which exploit religion to titillate or terrify, but no religious movies.

One need only visit the current series of Buñuel films at the Museum of Modern Art—especially "Nazarin," with its powerful depiction of the trials of a latter-day Christ figure—to get an idea of how foreign movie-makers, even the supposed atheists, have put Hollywood to shame. For further evidence of the European director's eagerness to come to grips with religion, consider Bergman's "The Seventh Seal," in which a knight returning from the Crusades plays a fatal game of chess with death; Fellini's "La Dolce Vita," with its contrast between the sweet pleasures of high society and the corruption of death; Rohmer's "Ma Nuit Chez Maud," featuring a night-long discussion of Pascal's religious gamble—the argument that it's wise to bet on God, because you have nothing to lose if you're wrong and much to gain if you're right; Bergman's "Cries and Whispers," showing a family's desperate attempt to find meaning in the lingering death of a sister; and Buñuel's "Belle de Jour," dealing with the death and resurrection of a modern-day Magdalene.

Each of these directors makes films in which the fundamental religious issues are the very stuff out of which the story emerges. Their American counterparts seem afraid to raise such basic questions. Even in vintage Hollywood films about the clergy, one got the impression that Pat O'Brien, Bing Crosby, Spencer Tracy and Frank Sinatra—not to

'Pacific Overtures' Is Neither East Nor West

Apparently on the general theory that a Japanese Kabuki play isn't so much interested in telling a story as it is in interrupting the play to tell a dozen other stories, the new Harold Prince-Stephen Sondheim musical at the Winter Garden halts its narrative at will to permit a "Reciter" to recount a tale. The tale is a long one (I'll shorten it) about a father who is departing on a trip and instructs his son, during his absence, to fashion a litter for his now feeble grandmother so that she can be carried into the mountains and there left to die. When the father returns, the son has built two litters. Asked why he has bothered with the second, the son replies that he will keep it for the father until he is approximately as enfeebled as the grandmother, whereupon he will meet the same suitable fate. That is the end of that irony. But I do think the son might have made three litters while he was at it. One for the show.

Normally, Mr. Prince and Mr. Sondheim know very well what they are about as they turn their restless talents to experimentation—and their restlessness is one of their greatest virtues—but a mishap has occurred here. They do seem firmly knowledgeable, and possessed of a possible idea, as they approach the visual appurtenances of "Pacific Overtures." Using the physical—and, to some degree, musical—formalizations of Kabuki style, they have dipped back to 1853 and the first visit of Commodore Perry to

Favorites in The Philharmonic Sweepstakes

Pierre Boulez will step down from his post as music director of the New York Philharmonic at the end of next season, and the orchestra is already casting about for a new conductor. Among today's more glamorous podium personalities, at least seven maestros might be considered candidates for the Philharmonic job. While in some cases only the fanciest eloquence could lure these musicians away from their current positions, it seems quite likely that one of them will preside over New York's resident orchestra in 1977, if only on a part-time basis. Each one is a familiar name to record collectors, and here is a sampling of what they have been doing recently in the studios.

Claudio Abbado. Currently permanent conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic and music director of the La Scala Opera, Abbado would hardly, one imagines, give up those two plums, even for New York. A pity, for he is one of the few conductors of the younger generation who responds equally to the classical, romantic and modern repertoires, and his performances almost invariably yield richly satisfying musical results. Certainly the Met could benefit from his presence in New York too.

Abbado's three new Deutsche Grammophon disks show him typically dealing with diverse fare, and all three are excellent. The two Stravinsky ballets, "Firebird" (the 1919 suite) and "Jeu de cartes" (1936), are crisply articulate, the instrumental balances calculated to a hair, and the rhythmic vitality immensely invigorating. As the accompanist to Friedrich Gulda's elegant pianism in

Videodance—It May Be A Whole New Art Form

By WALLACE WHITE

They used to come on like trained-dog acts—the ballerinas in tutus would glide in on the Ed Sullivan Show, dance a Dying Swan on a concrete floor, and glide out again, probably with aching legs. If the Swan did not always meet our expectations, it was not necessarily the fault of the dancer. Until very recently, television simply did not know how to capture dance. Now, with the inauguration of the Public Broadcasting Service's "Dance in America" series, whose first hour will be seen this Wednesday evening on Channel 13, there are signs that television is learning how to join with choreographers and dancers in creating a new and startlingly effective art form.

The series—a counterpart of Channel 13's "Theater in America" and "Music in America"—is being produced by WNET under a $1.5 million grant from the National Endowment for the Arts, the Corporation for Public Broadcasting and Exxon. The first program in the series is being done by the City Center Joffrey Ballet. The second, which is scheduled for February or March, will be done by choreographer Twyla Tharp and her avant-garde dance troupe. The third program—the series is being done on a more or less monthly basis—will be turned over to Martha Graham. Succeeding programs are still being discussed, but they will probably involve most of the best-known choreographers and dancers in this country.

None of this has been easy. In fact, it has been one of the most difficult exercises in adaptation that television has ever had to face. What the creators of this ground-breaking series have had to wrestle with is the fact that dance can never be the same on the small television screen as it is to someone seated in a theater witnessing a performance on a proscenium

A New Play—Going Concept

The Essex House Broadway Weekend Vacation.
Enjoy three plays from choice orchestra seats. Then get a specially arranged look behind the scenes—usually reserved for the "insiders"—Luxuriate in the comfort and service of one of New York's great hotels. All in a single, relaxed weekend vacation.

Start with Friday dinner at the Essex House in the King's Wharf Restaurant.

Follow with Friday evening, Saturday evening and Saturday matinee theater performances, each followed by chats with the play's leading performers and with production experts.

Saturday morning hear T. E. Kalem, TIME magazine's influential drama critic, make a critical appraisal of the season's offerings.

On Sunday morning, after one of Essex House's smash-hit brunches, meet and hear some of Broadway's best-known "names"—producers, actors, directors, playwrights and choreographers.

Sunday (January 25) noon, Mr. Kalem will hold an open discussion—questions from the audience, welcome—with three outstanding personalities of the theater world:

Richard Benjamin, starring in "The Norman Conquests" and (on the screen) in "The Sunshine Boys";

Rosemary Harris, the enthusiastically hailed star of the revival of "The Royal Family";

Philip Langner, distinguished co-director of the Theater Guild, which is currently offering two Broadway hits, "Absurd Person Singular" and "A Musical Jubilee."

Broadway Theater Vacation Weekends are planned as a continuing monthly series, starting Friday evening, January 23, through early Sunday afternoon, January 25.

It's all yours for just $169 per person, single occupancy. But reservations are limited. A $50 deposit per person guarantees the best of everything. And you can charge it on major credit cards.

For reservation and information, call (212) 247-0300, or toll free, (800) 228-9290. Or see your travel agent. Today.

The Case of a Child Prodigy Who Survived

SHIRLEY FLEMING

57, Ruggiero Ricci, one of the world's most famous violinists, looks more like a young man than a violinist. He stands at 5-foot-10 and compact, and is not for the faint of heart. He is not, however, in his brown Italian suit, might appear rugged. He is not, however, is unmistakably feisty, characteristic that usually helped him to surmount the classic case of child prodigy and go on to an encompassing career as an artist. Though he spends much of his life in airplanes, flying some four times a year, he plays a concert on average of every third day. He is setting up his base in New York City, having joined the Juilliard after three years of teaching at the University of Indiana, at Bloomington. He has taken a new name, a stone's throw from Lincoln Center, and his teaching as well as his current dates with New York Philharmonic, ending on Tuesday night, he plays the Sibelius concerto.

He was alone in these surroundings when he came in a visitor recently scussed his career and days as a child prodigy. His father was some kind of a musical genius.

of musical maniac," he said in tones of mild outrage, when asked if he were really true that he had played a toy fiddle in his crib before he could walk.

"I started before I can remember. My father had all seven children playing an instrument—one of my sisters played piano, another played trumpet but he let her switch to flute, thank God—after all, she was a girl. My brother George started on violin but went to cello, my sister Emma plays violin now, in the Met. I wanted to be a pianist, but my parents got me off that idea. They bribed me with fiddles. I'd wake up in the morning and there would be another one. Once I had five fiddles under my bed.

This all took place in Ricci's home town of San Francisco. At the same time that another prodigy in his neighborhood was being worked into shape, Ricci was being taught by his father, who was a violinist. He says Ricci was four years old when he started playing. He got everyone talking about prodigies, but believe me, when you find a prodigy, you find an ambitious parent in the background.

Ricci and Meinhart were both put to work under the well-known pedagogue Louis Persinger, destined to play a somewhat ambiguous role in Ricci's life. He had a strange career, the violinist says. He had two prodigies and lost both of them. Meinhart's father took Yehudi away to study with Adolf Busch. I followed Persinger to New York when he came to Juilliard, but later I was taken away too, after my New York debut in 1929. I played the Mendelssohn Concerto then. I was nine years old and had hair down to my shoulders and I looked like a girl."

The success of his debut concert and the subsequent legal "battle" over Ruggiero's guardianship (papa Ricci had signed him over to Persinger's assistant, then went to court and got him back) signing contributed much to musical gossip in 1930, and the newspapers had a good time with the courtroom details. "I didn't mind it then, I liked to show off," says the violinist. But the push and pull left its mark. "When I was nine or ten, it was beautiful fiddle playing. By the time I was 12 it was a fiasco. They took me and they changed me. Persinger was of the Belgian school, and when I was taken away from him they sent me to Michel Fauriol. He was trained in the Russian tradition, and he thought I was a genius or something so he threw the Brahms Concerto to me.

"There was no discipline, and I was playing on a large-model Strad that was too big for me. So of course I didn't play so well. People started criticizing me and it was hard. I was used to adoration. I wasn't a child any more, and I wasn't growing up. I was fighting my own image." A tour of Germany at 12 was spectacularly successful but produced another element of disruption: Ricci was put into the hands of a teacher in Berlin, Georg Kulenkampf, and this brief baptism into German technique increased his confusion.

What are the basic differences in national schools of violin playing? Ricci warned to the subject. "The Germans are measured in their playing. Block colors, clarity, lean sound. Rather like a harpsichord, in fact—not a style suited to strings. Spontaneity is verboten. The Franco-Belgians—Ysaye was their great exponent—are quite different. They have the grand manner and try to make the violin into something bigger, like an organ. They paint with master strokes, they want an over-all buildup of sonority, more by sweep than direct attack.

"The old Russian school did whatever sounded attractive—a lot of glissandi, beautifully done, with elegance and polish. You hear it in Heifetz. The Russians developed a set of very effective clichés. They were the originators of the most imitated style of string playing, and they made an enormous impact that left its influence on all of us. The new Russian school is schmalzy—much more romanticized. They use slower tempi, exaggerated rubati, an excess of vibrato—the long notes have too much vibrato and the passing notes are white. Still, it's a successful formula. People love sugar and sentimentality. We sell corn to the Russians and they sell it back to us."

Ricci was in full pursuit of his subject and had begun an evaluation of gypsy fiddle playing that promised to qualify momentarily for X-rating ("The gypsy is seductive, he is raping you with music"), when his visitor felt compelled to pull him around to autobiography again. What had led him, after his army years, to specialize in virtuosos repertoire (and, to become, incidentally, the first violinist to record the 24 Paganini solo Caprices complete)? "I forced myself in that direction because nobody had taken that road. I had to make a comeback, and my first New York recital after the army was a program of unaccompanied works. Mischka Elman said I was crazy, but it put me back in business."

He has been in business ever since, and along the way has produced some 500 recordings. Has his playing changed over the years? Ricci thinks so, decidedly. "I've been through three periods, and I'm still changing. My early playing was spontaneous—I liked it. I don't like concocted performances. Next comes a time when you try to be more profound, you study, you make decisions, you don't really get turned on, you tend to be programmed. With me, this middle stage—well, I don't say it was a disaster but I was too understated because I was afraid of bad taste. Now after 45 years I say I'm going to play like I want, and if they don't like it they can go to hell. It's better to be a prostitute than a nun."

As we got up to leave, Ruggiero Ricci, the prodigy who survived, made it clear that he had one more thing on his mind. "Tell them that teachers are ruining a lot of kids. Parents love to say 'my kid plays the Mendelssohn Concerto,' so they take their child away from a teacher who knows better and give him to one who will push him. There are a lot of teachers who are doing that. They're the criminals in this business."

Pop Notes: 'Audiences Have Made Our Song Their Anthem'

HENRY EDWARDS

most successful pop of 1975, according to the major musical trade (Billboard), Cashbox and World. It has been and Tennille's spunky of the Neil Sedaka ward Greenfield song, "Will Keep Us Together," released last February, has to date sold over 1.5 million copies, establishing pre-eminence of the keyboardist-arranger "Daryl Dragon" (producer Carmen Dragon) and his wife, vocalist Toni Tennille, in the rompers-up style of Johnnie and Glenn Campbell's "One Step at a Time," which sold over 1.5 million copies.

Edwards writes frequently about pop music.

we perform it in concert, people sing along—pop audiences have made it their anthem."

Even though they usually write their own material, the Captain and Tennille were persuaded to record the Sedaka-Greenfield tune by an executive of A&M Records. Whether that suggestion was born of prescience or dumb luck is hard to tell. The Dragons toured the nation between July 28 and Nov. 5 to affectionate acclaim, singing their "anthem" as well as other selections from their debut album, which bears the same name as the hit song. They also made 10 appearances on national talk and variety shows. By the year's end, the twosome had signed with ABC-TV to host a prime-time, one-hour musical variety show that will be seen this summer or early fall.

Last week the couple released a new single, "Lonely Nights," also culled from the Neil Sedaka songbook, and a second LP will follow at the end of next month. The Captain and Tennille are cautiously monitoring the progress of this new release. If it duplicates the success of "Love Will Keep Us Together," the Captain and Tennille, known only to patrons of local clubs in southern California a year ago, will find their instant stardom transformed into superstardom.

"The down cycle in popular music had to be counteracted by a positive cycle," remarks Toni. "We're part of that positive cycle; we hope it stays around for a while."

Enter Queen

The next kings of that musical thunder known as heavy-metal rock might very well be an English rock quartet called Queen. Scheduled to play at New York's Beacon Theater on Feb. 5, 6 and 7, the group has added an extra performance on Feb. 8 due to popular demand. In addition, "A Night at the Opera," Queen's new album release, has rapidly begun to scale the pop-music popularity charts.

Queen's appeal is rooted in its sound, typical heavy-metal volume and flash accented by lush vocal harmonies and guitarist Brian May's meticulously overdubbed guitar parts, which add an orchestral quality to the musical texture. The group also varies its sound with folk, pop, operatic and music-hall touches, while the subject matter of its lyrics range from teen desperation to excursions into the whimsical world of J. R. R. Tolkien.

During a career of less than three years, Queen has been subjected to an inordinate amount of critical abuse. Critics have found the group "pedestrian" while labeling its musical eclecticism "pretentious." These brickbats have not discouraged the musicians. "We're not ones to churn out a formula and stick with it merely because it's successful," says lead singer Freddie Mercury. "Our audience is sophisticated enough to appreciate our drastic musical variety."

"Drastic" or not, the group's musical ferocity has invited the same kind of critical drubbing that heavy-metal supergroup Led Zeppelin received during its early years—and Queen could be headed for the same kind of international success.

Broadway Blues

Original cast LP's of Broadway shows rarely become big sellers these days. Even last year's two biggest Broadway disks, Columbia's "A Chorus Line" and Arista's "Chicago," have not sold as well as expected. "A Chorus Line" has sold 85,000 copies—a "respectable" figure according to a Columbia spokesman, who added that "it's been a fight. The show hasn't produced a hit tune; without a hit tune there's no radio-play and without air-play there's not much opportunity for large sales."

Surveying the situation, a Los Angeles-based firm, Ziv International, has decided that the original cast recordings of old Broadway shows, all of them full of tuneful pop standards, are ripe for exploitation. Ziv is currently preparing a five-record set entitled "Show Stoppers" comprising "the 50 most electrifying Broadway show stoppers with the greatest all-time stars of the musical stage." Priced between $15 and $20, the album will be sold via TV and bookstores rather than record shops, enticing customers with such classics as "Do Re Mi" (Mary Martin), "Everything's Coming Up Roses" (Ethel Merman) and "The Rain in Spain" (Rex Harrison and Julie Andrews).

Ziv International may well have hit upon a clever sales gimmick. But will Broadway ever produce a truly musical hit show again? Addressing himself to this question recently, Arista Records president Clive Davis commented: "Someday a smart Broadway producer will entice a Paul Simon or an Elton John or a Paul McCartney to write for the theater; then great new songs will once again emanate from Broadway."

MUSIC VIEW

HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

Here It Is—The Real 'Boris' At Long Last

Want to give a belated Christmas present to the musician who has everything? It's expensive, at $175 for the two volumes, but it will close a gap in his library. It is the full score of Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunov," as the composer actually wrote it, and Oxford University Press has just published it in the David Lloyd-Jones edition, complete with critical commentary and musical appendices.

"Boris Godunov" is the greatest of all Russian operas, and it is hard to believe that a full score has never been available, but that is the case. For many years, of course, the Rimsky-Korsakov version of "Boris" was the one in use by opera houses all over the world. In many respects the Rimsky-Korsakov version has wonderful things in it. It also has one slight drawback: it is not what Mussorgsky composed. In 1928 the Soviet musicologist, Pavel Lamm, brought out the original score—in an edition of 200 copies only, and the edition was never put on sale. Thus the new Oxford University Press edition, and a handsome one it is, turns out to be a historic "first."

Oxford had the score ready last year, when the Metropolitan Opera mounted its much talked-about production of the Mussorgsky original (as opposed to the Rimsky-Korsakov), but the Lloyd-Jones critical volume was not yet available. Now here it is, and it makes fascinating reading. It also points up the considerable textual problems of this opera. Any conductor or producer who wants to go back to the "original" is going to be faced with an interesting set of choices, and none of those choices will satisfy all musicians and scholars.

Let's recapitulate. Mussorgsky, inspired by Pushkin, started work on "Boris Godunov" in 1868. He worked in a euphoric state, knowing that he was evolving something unusual. "When one is blazing a new trail, one feels doubly strong," he wrote. He looked forward to a kind of opera that would renounce all of the operatic traditions of the past. He even was careful to avoid the term "opera" in relation to "Boris." Instead he called it a "musical presentation." In December, 1869, the full score was finished. In 1871 the opera was rejected by the Maryinsky Theater: six black balls out of seven were cast. The basic reason was that the opera had no female role.

So Mussorgsky started a new version. He added the Polish act, which has a soprano as one prominent feature. He touched up other elements of the first version, discarding the St. Basil Scene and adding a newly composed Revolutionary Scene. He also reversed the order of the last act. As originally conceived, "Boris Godunov" ended with the death of the Tsar. But, following the suggestion of his friend, Vladimir Nikolsky, Mussorgsky decided to end "Boris" with the lament of the Simpleton.

On Feb. 5, 1873, three scenes from "Boris" were performed at a concert at the Maryinsky Theater. César Cui wrote a rave review. Shortly after that, the publishing firm of Bessel announced a vocal score. There are some significant differences between the vocal score and the manuscript full score. Finally, in 1874, "Boris Godunov" had its world premiere at the Maryinsky. It was not exactly the opera that Metropolitan Opera audiences have been admiring. Mussorgsky and the conductor, Eduard Napravnik, decided on some substantial cuts. But the premiere was a success, with the composer taking 18 to 20 curtain calls. The critical reaction was less enthusiastic. Among the critics who tore the opera apart was the very same César Cui who had admired it the previous year.

So what is the "definitive" version of Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunov"? Is it the first version of 1869, without the Polish act? (Some Mussorgsky specialists say that the 1869 version is superior to all subsequent reworkings.) Is it the vocal score of 1873? Is it the full score of 1872? Is it the version, with the cuts, that finally was produced in 1874?

Lloyd-Jones points out that until July, 1872, the only "definitive" version was the full score of the opera. But then came the Bessel vocal score, which was supervised and proofread by the composer. Although this was engraved between May and December, 1873, its text (writes Lloyd-Jones) is "essentially" that of the "definitive" vocal score completed in December, 1871. And Lloyd-Jones goes on to explain how he arrived at this newly published edition of the opera.

But neither he nor anybody else can fully answer the question: which is the "definitive" version? For instance, take the problem of the St. Basil Scene versus the Kromy Forest Scene. In his final version, Mussorgsky dropped the St. Basil Scene, using elements of it (including the heartrending Simpleton's lament) in the Kromy Forest. But the St. Basil Scene has some wonderful things in it. It is the short scene where Boris asks the Simpleton to pray for him. The Simpleton refuses. He cannot pray for a child murderer. The Metropolitan Opera, in its anxiety to present a "complete" version of "Boris," used the St. Basil Scene, and then necessarily had to cut and tamper with the Kromy Forest Scene to bring it into line. Mussorgsky's instincts were right. His opera was running too long, and he ruthlessly threw away the scene, incorporating one breathtaking element of it for his finale.

It is interesting that the original Mussorgsky orchestration sounds much better in the opera house than it looks on paper. At that, there were some modifications of the orchestration by Napravnik, and those can be seen in the manuscript of the full score, which reposes in Leningrad in the Central Music Library of the State Academic Theaters. But conductors are notorious touchers-up, even in Beethoven's symphonies, and Napravnik seems to have been careful in his editorial emendations. In any case, he had the composer at his side. Orchestration never was Mussorgsky's strong point, and he would gladly have taken Napravnik's suggestions about improvements in balance and texture.

Now that Oxford has brought out the full score and now that parts are available for orchestras everywhere, it would seem mandatory for future "Boris" productions to use the Mussorgsky original rather than the doctored Rimsky-Korsakov edition. Of course there are those who still prefer the more opulent-sounding Rimsky-Korsakov. But if ever there were a truth-in-advertising law in music, all performances of "Boris" would have to present the brand-name clearly. It should be either "Boris Godunov" by Modest Mussorgsky (meaning the original orchestration) or "Boris Godunov" by Mussorgsky-Rimsky-Korsakov. Then the operagoer would know exactly what is going on.

Conciertos Nos. 20 and 21. Alhadeo refines classical proportions without sacrificing urbane romantic undercurrents of both these works. el Barenboim: The present favorite in the nonje sweepstakes, Barenboim would probably seek a bit of the romantic flair that characterized Bernstein's regime. Not everybody reacts favorably to Barenboim's highly subjective approach to the classics. Infection for lush textures and broad rubato effects, sheer exuberance and unpredictable nature of sical personality make him an intriguing possibility. A conductor, Barenboim does not seem to be in a great o record, the standard Beethoven-Brahms-Mahler ry at this early point in his career (the piano re is a different story, however—how many other have recorded Beethoven's massive "Himmelsklavier" three times by the age of 30?). Most of his disks, in fact, have been of a higher nature— tion of short English pastorales for DG, the Dvorák halkovsky Serenades for Angel, and a group of Egar eats for Columbia. Barenboim draws every ne of emotion from these works, although at he effect becomes just too heaving and ohn Davis: Davis's two major affiliations at the e are music director of Covent Garden and principal onductor of the Boston Symphony. Possibly too a musician for New York's tastes, Davis nonetheless ure credentials and he may be ripe for a change: are at Covent Garden has been a stormy one—the e critics, usually fiercely partisan to their own, eadily give him a particularly rough time of it. e, Mozart and Beethoven have been this conductor's noteworthy achievements on disk. Sibelius is ively recent discovery for him, and his ns of the Fifth and Seventh Symphonies with the e Symphony mark the beginning of a complete cycle- r major undertaking if these performances set the ard. The BSO plays gloriously, and Davis shapes unusual symphonic structures into taut, tension-filled ents of brooding rugged power. The set of ven piano concertos contains unburied, thoughtful, le readings of these five works with Stephen as the sensitive, lucid and, when necessary, fiery eadille Davis provides a superbly gauged orchestral in Maseel: Maseel is apparently happily committed e Cleveland Orchestra—and why not, since the CO's onductor, the late George Szell, left him a fine rait. In addition, Maseel's appointment brought a ntract with a major label, London, and he has extensively broadened the orchestra's ating activities at home and on tour. All in all, ncestral picture in Cleveland seems one of the best in the country.

Perhaps this explains the heady exuberance of Maseel's eralwin disk—the "Cuban Overture," "Rhapsody in eralwin" and "An American in Paris"—which is simultaneously, rromantic, rhythmically infectious and deliciously y. If Gershwin "made an honest woman out of jazz" this music, Maseel's steamy approach and Ivan s's dashing pianism put her right back on the street, where she seems very much at home. The Clevelanders' version of Ravel's complete "Daphnis and Chloé" ballet is not as winning; the sonics are sumptuous but the score itself emerges sounding rather blurred and characterless. Maseel seems more attuned to Verdi's straightforward ballers, and he gives this tuneful music a de luxe treatment it would never receive in the opera house.

GERSHWIN: Cuban Overture; Rhapsody in Blue; An American in Paris; Ivan Davis; Cleveland Orchestra; London CS 6946. RAVEL: Daphnis and Chloé; Cleveland Orchestra; London CS 6998. VERDI: Ballet Music; Cleveland Orchestra; London CS 6945.

Zubin Mehta, who Zubin Mehta brought his Los Angeles Philharmonic to New York last November, the critical praise for both conductor and orchestra was extravagant. (Questioned directly in a Times interview about the possibility of taking over from Boulez, Mehta remained coyly noncommittal—a sure sign of interest.) There's no doubt that he has built the Los Angeles orchestra into an impressive ensemble, although the kind of standard repertory Mehta records faces stiff competition from even finer groups. His Beethoven Seventh Symphony has solid instrumental mass and substance, the phrasing is pliant and the execution sturdy; a commendable job, in short, but without any special kind of incandescence. Much the same could be said about the Rimsky-Korsakov perambulation, "Scheherazade"; as on all the Los Angeles disks, the rich, spacious reproduction creates a glamorous sonic image that almost makes the performance sound better than it is in fact the case.

BEETHOVEN: SYMPHONY No. 7; Egmont Overture; Los Angeles Philharmonic; London CS 6870. RIMSKY-KORSAKOV: Scheherazade; Los Angeles Philharmonic; London CS 6850.

Seiji Ozawa. Ozawa has been straddling the continent over the past several years as principal conductor of both the San Francisco and Boston Symphonies, but after this season he will belong entirely to Boston. This conductor has always struck me as a curiously "fenceless" interpreter—all the notes are in the right place, all the musical gestures seem correct enough, and yet the end product always has a starchy quality about it, stiff, formal and anonymous. There's some lovely playing on Ozawa's two Ravel disks with the Boston players, but one only needs to hear the same orchestra under Munch or Koussevitzky in this repertory to realize what is missing in terms of orchestral iridescence, rhythmic pointing and melodic line. With the San Francisco Symphony Ozawa has recorded Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, again a finely disciplined performance but flat and passionless.

RAVEL: Daphnis and Chloé; Boston Symphony; DG 2530 563.

RAVEL: La Valse; Rhapsodie espagnole; Bolero; Boston Symphony; DG 2530 475. BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 3; San Francisco Symphony; Philips 6500 002.

André Previn. A popular figure on the British musical scene since he took over the directorship of the London Symphony in 1963, Previn has always been viewed rather suspiciously when he conducts in this country—the classical establishment here has never quite forgiven his early years in Hollywood as a highly successful film composer/arranger and jazz pianist. This season is Previn's first as conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony, and he clearly plans to expand his American career in the future.

New Previn records from England appear almost every month, and he has built up a large discography on Angel over a brief period. Like Ozawa, Previn is a low-profile conductor—possibly he is overcompensating for his youthful "sins" in the pop world with these poker-faced, devalitized readings. At any rate, there is little one can say about the disks listed below, except that they are all skillfully executed, scrupulously faithful to the score and terribly boring.

PROKOFIEV: Symphony No. 5; London Symphony; Angel S 37100. HOLST: The Perfect Fool; Egon Heath; The Wandering Scholar (Stewart Bedford, cond.); London Symphony; Angel S 37152. BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 7; London Symphony; Angel S 37116. TCHAIKOVSKY: Manfred; London Symphony; Angel S 37018.

Pierre Boulez. It seems only fair to conclude with a few words on the departing maestro's new disks. During his tenure, Boulez programmed a lot of music for which he seemed temperamentally unsuited, but fortunately his records have concentrated on the music he does best: the most recent, Stravinsky's "Firebird" and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloé," are both brilliant versions of these popular ballets. Every orchestral sonority is superbly tuned, the rhythms are taut and sinuous, the over-all shape of the scores carefully plotted but the results always sound fresh and spontaneous. The Philharmonic's new conductor, whoever he may be, will face some very exacting standards when he takes his first turn at this repertory.

STRAVINSKY: Firebird; New York Philharmonic; Columbia M 33598. RAVEL: Daphnis and Chloé; New York Philharmonic; Columbia M 33523.

Sports Gabbers —All Born to Lose?

slack, the breed is improving steadily, as are athletes in general. The result at its best can be a mixture of information and jest, which may be as close as one can come to improvement in a craft form moving relentlessly in opposite directions: toward news and toward entertainment.

It would be cruel to rate these breakthrough colormen too closely at this point. NBC's John Brodie, for instance, is working manfully to convey what he knows, namely the "felt" experience of quarterbacking, and he has improved as much as anyone. Still, his grip on language remains so insecure as to make him sound almost childish at times. And his dependence on phrases like "On the money" flattens his freshness. CBS's Johnny Unitas brings one or two ideas to the stadium ("inside rush" and "stepping up in the pocket") and tends to repeat them tirelessly all afternoon long with a curious air of smugness. On the plus side, he has cut down on the pointless laughter. Sonny Jurgensen is cursed with an evil-sounding voice more suited to selling strange spices in the Far East, but sources at CBS tell me he's working on this.

And so on. They are learning their trade, and, as one of them says, the pressure is greater than it ever was on the playing field. The form's possibilities are better glimpsed in the successes, of which the most dazzling so far is certainly NBC's Don out of their separate and opposite concerns.

By this impossible standard, the best team around right now would seem to be CBS's Tom Brookshier and Pat Summerall—which by good chance is doing today's Super Bowl (by bad chance, their network does less interesting camera work than the others). This pair has actually been known to approach the foothills of adult conversation. Brookshier is a natural wag who doesn't have to strain, and Summerall sounds like a real friend and not a hasty arrangement.

It may not be Dr. Johnson and his circle, but it's not the Nixon White House either. Today's announcers even warn you when a cliché is coming: "To use an old cliché" is how Gowdy puts it. But what about the reporting? Doesn't this suffer from the flow of epigram? On ABC's Monday Night Football, it certainly does. Of course, this showcase for Howard Cosell—an event unto himself, quite unlike anyone else—is not typical sports coverage but a hybrid, part-time variety show, as fits the hour. The running plot has Alex Karras playing a sort of Lou Costello to Frank Gifford's Bud Abbott, while Cosell is the burlesque emcee with the tie that lights up.

Nonetheless, Cosell does arrive extraordinarily well-prepared; he primes his audience with a lot of motherly information about where this and that young man comes from, etc., but his banter with Karras inevitably cuts into the here-and-now, as one might deduce from the exasperated-parent tones of Gifford.

Yet, is it worth it? Does every single game of football have to be analyzed like priceless military history? ABC's crew may have a sense of social context, and they do seem to get out of the hotel more, but small talk gobbles time, and the purists resent it.

Which, of course, is where we came in. Some fans want tactics, some don't. For each one who likes the wheezy

Meredith. Meredith seems to have that extra second in hand that a good passer should, and he uses it to sing, to talk back to the sound truck and even to humanize his play-by-play partner Al DeRogatis, no mean trick. One of the key functions of the new breed of color men is to breathe life into the waxworks of yesteryear. DeRogatis, with a mind like a data bank and a voice like the mummy's curse, has recently been heard making shy jokes—alarming at first, but it takes the heat off his brain cells.

Over at CBS, the effervescent Alex Hawkins has performed a similar function with Lindsay Nelson, which is akin to humanizing an English civil servant. Nelson, like Chris Schenkel, is a victim of broadcast fatigue or else of too much radio-barking, and one feels that by now he would announce a death on the field with the same empty brightness he would use to describe a new line of Chevys. Yet, with a sassy fellow like Hawkins, he jerks to life, as fans are wont to do around jocks. "You've been everywhere and seen everything," says Hawkins, and Nelson expands like yeast.

For a curious case of rejuvenation that comes and goes, consider NBC's venerable Curt Gowdy: during the summer, he could pass for a dozy old clubman browsing through baseball with his soporific sidekick Tony Kubek, making one winning run sound much like another, a not unpleasant effect; but in the winter, he dances to Meredith's tunes like a schoolboy.

Conversely, CBS's literate Vin Scully has played a species of Professor Higgins to the floundering Jurgensen, relaxing him the way another jock might and pointing his nose in the right direction, while NBC's anonymous Jim Simpson gets all there is to get out of John Brodie. It finally comes down to a division of labor between the clowns and the journalists. As a rule, the gagmen are too busy working on their material to notice things much, while the reporters are too preoccupied for the repartee. Yet, somehow they must make a conversation ramblings of a Heywood Hale Broun at the Derby, there is another who prefers the hoarse triphammer of a Bill Mazer who gets all his Klimkinowski - to - Pantouffle-to-Wiggins passes straight and is so wound up by the end that he can't stop talking for several hours afterward. Yet, two substantial changes have taken place in the realm of sportscasting. One is that the boys of the old brigade were basically radio men and ill at ease with pictures. And two, that today's announcer is freer than he used to be. Just not having to do commercials is a help. (Lindsay Nelson might lose that glazed sound for keeps if he didn't have to sell beer all summer for the Mets.) And although today's sportscasters still apparently have to slaver over the glories of the officiating ("the refs overall do a great magnificent outstanding job") and tout network shows to nerveless ears, they have at least the freedom of cub reporters or NFL coaches to stamp their feet now and then, and even admit that a game is dull. If they do, the League doesn't push them so hard, the networks don't bail down so much, and they don't have to consult their positive manuals any more if it isn't exactly emancipation, it's at least air a man can breathe.

Personally, I would still like to try near-silence, but one is fortified by the hope that this very afternoon Brookshier and Summerall will say what they really think of Commissioner Peter Rozelle and the Nutsy Tefer eeing and even the broad casting bloopers, which usually outnumber the refs—and all the other things they undoubtedly say off camera.

The hope at least is something new.

Television

The worlds of music and video art are carefully pasted together in two hours of public television this afternoon at 2 o'clock. But, by program's end, each territory is left curiously unjoined.

The occasion is the second of six programs featuring Leonard Bernstein and the Charles Ives Lectures he delivered at Harvard University following Mr. Bernstein's performance in a 20-visualization, created and produced by Ron the Fraulde and Liebestod from Wagner's "Tristan

Bernstein continues to be astonishingly thorough in his riving and distribution of himself. The lectures, "The Unanswered Question" (in tribute and to a 1908 work of Charles Ives), are available on film, on records and on videotapes produced by Video Inc., a company in which Mr. Bernstein has a social interest. Using specially filmed music performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Philharmonic, the lectures were delivered in the large Harvard Square Theater, and more intimate studios of station WGBH, where they were recorded for TV. Bernstein is, of course, no novice in television, as using the medium to brilliant historic effect many days of "Omnibus" through, among other long runs on the New York Philharmonic's People's Concerts. Over the years, the Bernstein has become as important as the music he is to be playing or conducting at any given podium, oratorio, the projections of inner ecstasy, the sincerity and commitment—the use of familiar devices is superbly designed to ding onlookers that they are in the presence of a sensitive genius, certainly someone special in the context of the Norton Lectures, these as are surprisingly self-defeating. Considerably more than the simple music-appreciation terms of People's Concerts, the lectures attempt to origins of musical sound, using linguistic. This afternoon, for instance, Mr. Bernstein applies the theories of Noam Chomsky to a search for a "musical syntax" that enables the composing of a melody to be compared with the forming of a sentence.

The result, like some of Mr. Bernstein's performing gimmicks, is distressingly superficial. He does warn the audience that he is "only hypothesizing and speculating, but that approach hardly expunges the overall sense of gibberish that dominates the lectures. Mr. Bernstein tosses off comments on syntactic modes or structural permutations, on contrapuntal syntax or conjuncting with all of the dedication of a diner ordering one from Column A and two from Column B.

Taking a Mozart symphony, he says, "Now listen to this whole exposition again—with no comments from me," and he then proceeds to mug and mime ecstatic response for the camera. "A great moment now," he promises as the music plays, "isn't that marvelous?" On "Love this moment! My favorite moment!" Everything in sight, including the maestro himself, is reduced to marvelous.

William Empson is quoted and then dutifully described as the author of "that marvelous book 'Seven Types of Ambiguity.'" The lecture show rings with show business hyperbole. Distinctions become meaningless. The performance comes off smoothly, but the point of the lecture seems to have been lost on the way to the studio.

The concluding contribution of video art is called "A Visualization of an Experience Within Music." Mr. Hays employed slit-scan animation, computer film animation, computer video animation and videosynthesis—all processed through a CMX editing system—and his work is being represented as "the first time such a broad range of sophisticated, technical image-making media has been used to unify a single and distinct work of art." Perhaps so, but the product still comes out resembling those interminable abstractions that film buffs consumed years ago at Cinema 16.

Experimentation with video deserves encouragement, but it cannot demand blindness to its limitations. This "visualization" is the type of work that begs for impatience.

It was made at a cost of $46,000, and its effects hover between that of a kaleidoscope Esther Williams water ballet and coming in for a landing at a psychedelic airport. Wagner's magnificent music is used as a backdrop for terribly ordinary images. Standard sexual references are stated in orifice-type designs (which kept reminding this viewer of the CBS "eye"). The almost hypnotic exultation of the Liebestod is illustrated with a somewhat tacky starburst, the type that might be found on a cheap Christmas card.

Instead of expanding the musical experience, the "visualization" actually leaves it contracted, reducing it from the limitless possibilities of the listener's imagination to the specifics of a few inadequate images. Interestingly, the piece is most effective when one of the abstract images is transformed briefly into a real seascape. The intrusion of this "real" world into theoretical abstractions is distinctly invigorating. Creating a successful visual context for music on television remains a problem, but the answer would not seem to be in uninspired abstract illustrations.

NBC's Foreign Policy Report—Second Thoughts

SEND HOOPES

World — Hard three-hour NBC report presents a time on Jan. 18, 1976, partially attempt to come with the heart of national problems set U.S. foreign way of preface, provided a summary to which has responded at 30 years, a cavalcade of crises. And, by word, it sought by policy is now and carried out doubtless Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, the more descriptive and commentary analysis, the segments, and the generalities facing our re not clearly ed.

It succeeded, in demonstrating the truth of the situation. We, a world, we can control, but also we cannot, without losing our swag and arms, pushy about form of democracy perhaps learn a pessimistic much of man-

How American has evolved was succinctly to end of World in our relative long continuous and genuine crises to the present point where, battered by Vietnam, Watergate, inflation, and the shift of economic power to Third World oil producers, "We seem," in anachronism John Chancellor's words, "to have lost the sense of our common purpose."

Where the report most obviously disappointed was in its failure to reach focused conclusions about the issues and problems it had chosen to present. Had I been asked to edit parts of this special report, I would have locked onto one question, and asked it relentlessly with regard to perhaps five subject areas. What should the United States do about (1) détente; (2) nuclear weapons; (3) the likely advent of Marxist governments in several smaller countries (Portugal, Italy, Angola); (4) key resources, we need in the Third World; and (5) desperate poverty in the Fourth World?

NBC News' Edwin Newman successfully explained that détente needs to be distinguished from a mutual acquiescence to the status quo. Détente is primarily a process by which admittedly different and naturally antagonistic political and ideological systems are trying to establish a broader, more stable basis for their continued coexistence. Central to détente is the shared assumption that nuclear war between armed superpowers has become suicidal and therefore outside the bounds of rational policy. A second, more arguable assumption is that greater East-West trade and cultural exchange will gradually open up the Soviet system to the virtues and safeguards of democratic diversity, despite the centuries-old attachment of Russian governments to the dread and stultifying organs of suppression.

But, as the NBC program made clear, both assumptions are now under challenge from the right, left and center. Liberals and conservatives combined to applaud Senator Jackson's effort to make free Jewish emigration a condition of most-favored-nation treatment for the U.S.S.R. But the Soviet refusal to accept the linkage has left American businessmen frustrated by the loss of $2-billion in trade (which the West Europeans are picking up), and American civil libertarians are disheartened by the virtual cessation of Jewish emigration (which was moving reasonably well under Dr. Kissinger's private pro-Jackson diplomacy).

American support for détente is being further eroded by evidence that the Soviets continue to insist on the right to support their own kind of social change in underdeveloped countries (like Angola), but the unexamined assumption is that our own actions in these places are so genuinely disinterested and virtuous as to be above moral reproach. It is a familiar ideological blimpiness; unfortunately, the facts are not quite so simple. The U.S. Government, not fully trusting détente to stabilize the status quo, has quite clearly reserved the right to manage change in the outer world along lines compatible with its own view of the U.S. national interest. Our policies in Chile, Greece, Portugal and Angola make this clear; nor has it occurred to us that détente might logically oblige us to impose a settlement on the Israelis as a necessary contribution to harmony between the superpowers in the explosive Middle East. In short, we need to accept the truth that détente is an important but limited understanding.

As for the nuclear-arms race, the NBC commentators wisely pointed out the sinister problem of proliferation, which the superpowers, fascinated or obsessed by each other's weapons development, tend to ignore. Fred Eise, the mild-mannered head of the impotent arms-control agency, was brought forward to explain that the basic American strategy of deterrence is directed at the U.S.S.R., or at the U.S.S.R. and China; but that it is really not a useful posture in a situation characterized by an epidemic spread of nuclear weapons. This is quite true. Unfortunately, it has little or no influence on U.S. nuclear-arms policy. Another hard choice is how we should deal with Communist governments that come to power through acceptable constitutional means in smaller countries. Here, despite rapprochement with the U.S.S.R. and China, it continues to be the official American gut-reaction that the Marxist faction in any situation must be resolutely opposed. Dr. Kissinger has repeatedly taken this position even where there was little or no evidence of Russian or Chinese influence, and where the strategic implications were negligible (Chile, as Senator Church told NBC News, is "a dagger pointed straight at Antarctica"). Interviewed by NBC, Kissinger (appearing) bemused and pudgy, and speaking with an unaccustomed detachment and world-weariness) justified American interference in Chile by saying he had been

"worried" about the "irreversible" change that would have resulted from the advent of a Marxist government.

This is a legitimate worry. Since the end of World War II, the United States has hoped and worked for a world populated by a majority of reasonably liberal, functioning democracies, but now major trends everywhere are depressingly unfavorable to that conception of global order. Uncontrolled birth rates, incompetent leadership, shortages of food and energy are driving much of the world away from democratic experiments and toward authoritarian arrangements of both the right and the left. But the operative question is what can we do about it? In Italy, for example, the next few months may see the governmental participation of a Communist party that has not only advanced by acceptable political means, but has also explicitly denounced the policies of the U.S.S.R. It is not impossible to predict that such an Italian Communist government would support NATO. In such a situation, are there valid grounds for the United States to oppose and disrupt the normal political processes of Italy?

With regard to our increased dependence on critical raw materials in the Third World, NBC News made a balanced presentation. OPEC tests oil prices without consulting the users, Jamaica has raised the price of bauxite about four times and other commodity cartels are in the making—all of which generates acute problems and heated resentment in the United States and throughout the developed world. On the other hand, these few resource-rich countries are rained in poverty, so that raising the price of their one or two exportable commodities appears to them the only way to raise an intolerably low standard of life.

Moreover, oil and bauxite are finite; when they are gone, the countries in question must earn their keep by other and uncertain means. The U.S. choice? To accept and adjust to a drastic, though perhaps temporary, shift in economic power, or attempt to lead a counterrevolution against the forces that so anger and dismay us. Wisely, NBC News did not encourage us to fan the flames of a global civil war.

With regard to the Fourth World (those numerous, populous, desperately poor countries that lack any exportable resources), the problem facing us is more moral than economic. NBC News chose Honduras as the model "international basket case," utterly dependent on American food-for-peace grants, ravaged by American inflation and the new OPEC oil prices, and suffering large-scale malnutrition. It is the consensus of experts that the standard of life in most of the Fourth World has declined in the last two years and that there is no hope whatsoever of a short-term recovery. The question NBC News posed here was what, if anything, should the United States do? Regrettably, the program did not seriously analyze the painful choices.

The final segment of the program, which addressed the question of how foreign policy is made, seemed the least interesting, perhaps because the subject is so old hat. Yet, it did contain the most perceptive comment of the evening. Dr. Kissinger was asked when, in view of his whirlwind pace and crowded schedule, he found any time for "serious reflection." His reply was that "sustained reflection" must usually occur before one takes office, for once there "events force themselves upon you," leaving little time for deeper thought.

HILTON KRAMER

Alberto Giacometti's Moral Heroism

Alberto Giacometti died on Jan. 11, 1966, at the age of 64. To mark the 10th anniversary of that event, the Sidney Janis Gallery has organized an excellent exhibition of his work—over 50 sculptures, paintings and drawings selected from the copious oeuvre the artist produced during the last 20 years of his life...

as Giacometti did, is a fitting epitaph for both the man and his work. It was entirely characteristic of Giacometti that he spoke of "what I'm trying to do" rather than dwell on what he had actually accomplished. For he conceived of the artistic task in those last years as a labor foredoomed to failure...

"A drive to capture something that remains forever beyond one's reach." Right, "Heroic Portrait of Diego" lead weight, to the block-like "earth" it occupies. They were clearly not meant to be a merely symbolic distortion in the facile Surrealist manner, for Giacometti had abandoned all such devices as false to experience. Only now have I come to understand, I think, what these feet signified for Giacometti's sculpture...

The Surprising Fascination of Indian Art

By JOHN CANADAY

Often baffling in subject matter and punctuated here and there by humor or demonism, the 30 Indian drawings from the 16th through the 19th centuries in a new exhibition at Asia House nevertheless make a first impression of exotic delicacy in the service of enchanting loveliness. From picture to picture this is an alluring show, easy to amble through as a series of optical delights to be savored independently, without questions about dates, styles, schools, religious and historical references, or all the other associations that make this more than a collection of unfamiliar and seductive little pictures.

But stop en route to follow the course of a line describing a profile, or a lock of hair, or for that matter an eyelash, or pause to examine the details of a figure a fraction of an inch high enmeshed with other figures in a battle, a parade or a festival, and a casual passage is no longer possible. One by one the drawings become inexhaustible beneath their exquisite surfaces, astounding in their coordination of detail, amazing in their technical finesse. Gradually they reveal a stylistic variety at least as wide as that of Western drawings over the same centuries.

The Asia House exhibition, which opened last week, coincidentally overlaps what could have been arranged as a companion show of superb drawings covering the same period in European art—115 examples from the collection of Mr. and Mrs. Eugene V. Thaw at the Morgan Library, which opened early last month and runs through Feb. 15. Most people who visit the Morgan show will recognize it as an essential history of styles and concepts that were elaborated in painting but reach us more intimately in drawings, which engage us in a form of personal conversation with artists who speak more formally in their painting. This widened understanding of drawings is one of the happiest results of art education (including museum exhibitions as a form of education) in the United States over the last 15 years or so—proof that culture booms can't be all bad despite their generating great loads of short-lived, parasitic "cultural" junk.

Indian drawings, however, have not shared in this new understanding. Stuart Cary Welch, who organized the Asia House show, opens his catalogue with the comment that "in spite of the tremendous and increasing excitement about Western drawings on the part of specialists and public alike," Indian drawings have never before been the subject of a full-scale exhibition. Even to skim his catalogue is to realize that this exhibition, so easy to accept as enchanting, is to Indian art what the Thaw drawings are to European art—a small, personal summary of a very large historical subject.

The difference between the two exhibitions—a difference that could hardly be greater within the coincidence of their identical chronology—is that at Asia House we approach an unfamiliar subject through an unfamiliar, highly specialized form of expression, while at the Morgan Library we have the pleasure of finding a familiar subject summarized in terms we have come to understand. This begins to sound as though I am leading up to the admission that a conscientious art lover must approach the Asia House exhibition studiously, questioning the exoticism of its appeal for Westerners and striving to assimilate four centuries of the history of Indian painting on this one occasion. Not so. The exhibition faces a visitor with such a beautiful introduction to a subject of such vast extensions that the thing to do is to make the most of the opportunity to enjoy it on whatever terms appeal to you most.

Some people will find it useful to begin their visit with the tape tour recorded by Allen Wardwell, the gallery's director. There are also seats in front of some of the drawings to minimize the unavoidable difficulty of any drawing show, where small-scale works of art meant to be seen a few at a time at close range have to be viewed in large numbers with other people. This problem is increased in the case of Indian drawings because so many of them are next to microscopic in detail. The gallery plans to supply a few magnifying glasses, but it might be safest to bring your own.

With Mr. Welch's catalogue in one hand and a magnifying glass in the other, someone who already has an acquaintance with Indian art may find himself entering a world he hardly suspected existed. ■

No Shortage of Artistic Energy In SoHo

One of Andre's new works—"a stalwart example of American plain statement"

People fall in love with SoHo, and we shouldn't be surprised. Sometimes everything down there hangs together so memorably that we don't know what to marvel at most: the cast-iron architecture, so strongly accented by the light; the funky, irresistible, one-person stores; the long-distance views that streak north and south; or the majestic arrivals of the trucks at the Crosby Paper Stock Co., Inc., and Masquard and Co., Inc. Those trucks are something to see when they are loaded fore and aft with papers so brightly colored (and so ingenious in their juxtaposition) that they put most painters to shame.

There are bad days, too, when there's just too much mess in the street, the elevators don't work, the eating places put on unwarranted airs, the gallery director has been out since cocktail time last Thursday, and the shows make us feel that we are neck-high in impatience and shall go under shortly for good.

Those are the days to duck into Jasp Rietman's bookstore before desolation sets in, or to patrol the streets in search of one of those idiosyncratic endeavors that get set up because just one or two people really believe in them. (One such was the nonstop, uncut reading of Gertrude Stein's "The Making of Americans" which began at noon at the Paula Cooper Gallery on New Year's Eve and finished around 3 P.M. on Jan. 2 after more than a hundred readers had taken part.)

Still, art's the thing. Carl Andre's new show at the John Weber Gallery includes two new floor-pieces which are among the best things he has done. They sound easy to make: what's difficult about getting 144 identical thick plaques of tin and forming them up in a square? Simply that the thickness has to be just right, and the size of the individual squares has to be just right, and the complexion of the tin has to be just right. When all these conditions are fulfilled and we step onto the piece, we feel as though we are walking on a great sea of light. I don't know of any work of art that ever gave quite that sensation.

Andre's other, larger, more complex floor-piece is pretty good, too. It is an immensely long, narrow rectangle formed from 576 zinc, magnesium, aluminum, copper, iron and lead plaques. The carefully patterned work, epic in scale, has 16 squares, each with 36 plaques. Andre's work reminds us of Italian Renaissance floorways. We remember that when those Italian pavings are in the open, a squall of rain or an abrupt change in the light may give them an entirely new character; this new Andre piece changes its nature in much the same way as we walk around it. It is by turns warm and cool, brilliant and grumpy, urbane and gruff. It smiles, glowers, pulls faces, does everything but get up and walk away. How strange that this dreamlike experience should be owed to something so absolutely regular in its formation and so ordinary in its components!

The show also includes five wooden pieces. Two of them are quite new. Carried out in Western Red cedar, they give off a powerful and most agreeable smell. But all five are stalwart examples of an American gift for plain statement which, in the case of Andre's sculpture, is in effect a transplantation of Brancusi's wooden sculptures without any of the overtones of myth, totem and taboo which Brancusi made welcome.

SoHo has its dedicated anthropologists, and one of them is the director of Buecker and Harpsichords, that cross between a gallery and a craftsman's atelier which is located upstairs at 465 West Broadway. This little front room is showing a grand total of around 140 American collagists. Some of them, like Charnton von Wiegand and Ray Johnson, are well known for their command of the medium.

Others (Robert Whitman, Robert Goodnough, James Brooks) appear on the list as moonlighters from other modes of expression. Some of them are barely known—to me, at least—but stand out for the resource with which they handle the medium; Michael Cooper, Addie Herder, Jeanne Miles and Stanton Kreider come into this category. (Bob Benson would get a prize, too, if prizes were being offered.) Some of the entries are dreadful, but of what large mixed show is that not true?

Sherman Drexler has long been a compulsive painter of the human figure (his own as well as others). He has the advantage of having around the house the kind of downright over-vitalized human being who just wouldn't dream of putting herself into the kind of languid trance which is common form in life classes the world over. Whence the inventive and porpoise-like gambols which so often form Mr. Drexler's principal subject. And as he is an old hand at making wry statements about his own anatomy, the end result is rarely dull.

His new paintings at the Landmark Gallery are well up to expectation in these respects. Lifelong Drexler-enthusiasts will cherish in particular the painting in which he is carried aloft by his redoubtable partner, the way a trucker carries a grandfather clock. But visitors who get over the immediate curiosity of the subject matter will go on, I think, to notice that the handling of the figures is none the less adroit for its complete lack of self-consciousness. Mr. Drexler knows something about tone, too; the show is bound together by the consistent tightness of the uninflected backgrounds. And as to what it is like to live with another human being, these paintings have more to tell us than most novels.

To take a given proposition and act it out on canvas in terms of word and image is not actually very difficult to do. The idea, for instance, of cutting a lake in half with a big pair of scissors is the kind of quirky, paradoxical fancy which would earn its keep in a long poem and maybe even stick out in the memory. Spelled out the way it is in one of Fabrizio Plessi's new paintings at the James Yu Gallery, it comes across as literal and unresonant. There's nothing wrong with it, but there isn't quite enough that's right with it to make us want to take it home and look at it forever.

This said, and despite intrusive echoes of other artists (the giant, Oldenburg-like sponge, for example, which is meant to be lowered into the Grand Canal in Venice when the flood water comes rolling in), this is a show worth looking at. Mr. Plessi has some droll notions; it is only when we think of the quadruple or sextuple irony of Arakawa, the master of this particular genre, that we may find our diet a bit thin.

Japan Built The Ultimate Megastructure by Chip Works Beauty

From the people who gave you big architecture now comes counterpoint. The Museum of Modern Art's large exhibition, which closed earlier this week, has been followed by a small show "Shinjuku—The Phenomenal City" well that the two exhibits were installed on different floors of the museum (they overlapped briefly before the Beaux-Arts closed) because they represent extreme polar attitudes toward the art of architecture and the city.

The Beaux-Arts show was a widely put-endorsement of formal principles of planning—representing an elite, orderly, public and permanent approach to the art of building monuments. Shinjuku is the exact opposite: a celebration—the chaotic, unplanned, but closely structured profit and human use) development of a vast dense and amorphous cluster of shopping activity in the heart of Tokyo.

This study in the dynamics of city growth of two Americans—Peter Glück, an architect, and a historian—and a Japanese architect, Koji Taki. The exhibition, under the sponsorship of the Department of Architecture and Design, photographs, slides, banners, signs and a display of flowers and foods that upstages, as a Pop art object in the museum, "Experience map the area's functions and flavors—such as said entertainment spots—into a visual record of Shinjuku is not a "place" in the conventional sense: there is no local residential community. It is a spectacular 20th-century environment, approximately a mile square, built around a transit hub where nine urban train lines and several dozens of routes come together at a point four miles from the business district of Tokyo, an unplanned, shifting concentration of mixed commercial growth up in highly profitable and vulgar cool air is now the most expensive in the world—square foot near the station—and no central authority controls it.

Three million people pass through the day—more than 10 times as many as use Grand Central, it is horrendous. At least half a million stop off to shop, eat, drink or be entertained. The area is anchored by five huge department stores, in addition, 1,100 places to drink, 240 food stores, 50 drug and cosmetic stores, 40 go-go and mahjong clubs, 40 theater hotels "serving couples at hourly rates."

The area's functions range from slick, glossy commercial to shoddy, squalid and a suburban-type shopping center and lead to pornography and prostitution. Few are their own buildings; they are packed into structures or along underground and street strident cacophony for every conceivable use.

"The only certainty in Shinjuku's future," text explains, "is a state of perpetual change in the Japanese tradition of design as accommodation and flexibility of use, and in the Western economic laissez-faire, it represents not a process. Shinjuku is described as "the one ad hoc solutions to particular problems by participants, public and private." The role of the show's organizers, is a fluid, person of "fantasy and release"—the antithesis of a model of "unity, consistency and permanence" is the physical expression of the volatile functions today and the way it answers it expeditiously and transiently. Shinjuku's are the ultimate megastructure.

It is also the ultimate Pop environment: change underground—in plastic. Decorative cherry blossoms give way to fake, shiny synthetic autumn leaves; plastic rocks represent Japanese landscape. Store openings are plastic wreaths—hanawa—of such vibrant are objects of stunning esthetic impact. For a striking array of plastic display models from noodles to hamburgers; the fruit jellies outstanding. A cup of coffee has the cream tilted above, the stream of plastic "liquid" the tilted container in a bit of inspired touch.

But in the museum, the vulgarity and Shinjuku are so artfully arranged for analysis that only hints come across. The crush and are lauded and explained, but not convey extremely cerebral celebration of disorder elegant and very high-class translation of

What the show succeeds in conveying quite profound consideration of what makes work in terms of function, history, social-sensory effect. Both the vision and the use are deeply indebted to Venturi and Scott Brown's treatise on the popular, vernacular, "Learning From Las Vegas." Shinjuku is a growth, service and pleasure phenomenon, a modern city-form of prime significance, awesome scale.

Shinjuku succeeds because a number of mutually-supporting elements come together: the kind of facilities that are either natural, at a transportation center, whether spontaneously or planners try to build their places, profitable things happen that are so felicitous; the lessons of ad hocism are care. So must the lessons of the failures of planning, which are legion and awful. As is applicability at both ends of the scale.

Ad hocism is very popular right now. radical approach rejects all planning as a manipulative instrument used against social danger of ad hocism is a kind of Rousseau virtues of the natural process which, like thought to be in itself good. The danger, a rejection is the spurious appeal of vast, Odious sociological revelation in the name of vision of truth and justice. It is one of the most interesting, pervasive and overlooked

All planning—from traditional practice—shares the trap of half-truths. The most lesson we have learned is that nothing perfect and that Utopia may not even be a way of To anyone concerned with cities. "Shinjuku Phenomenal City" is an extraordinarily in-

By PHYLLIS MERAS

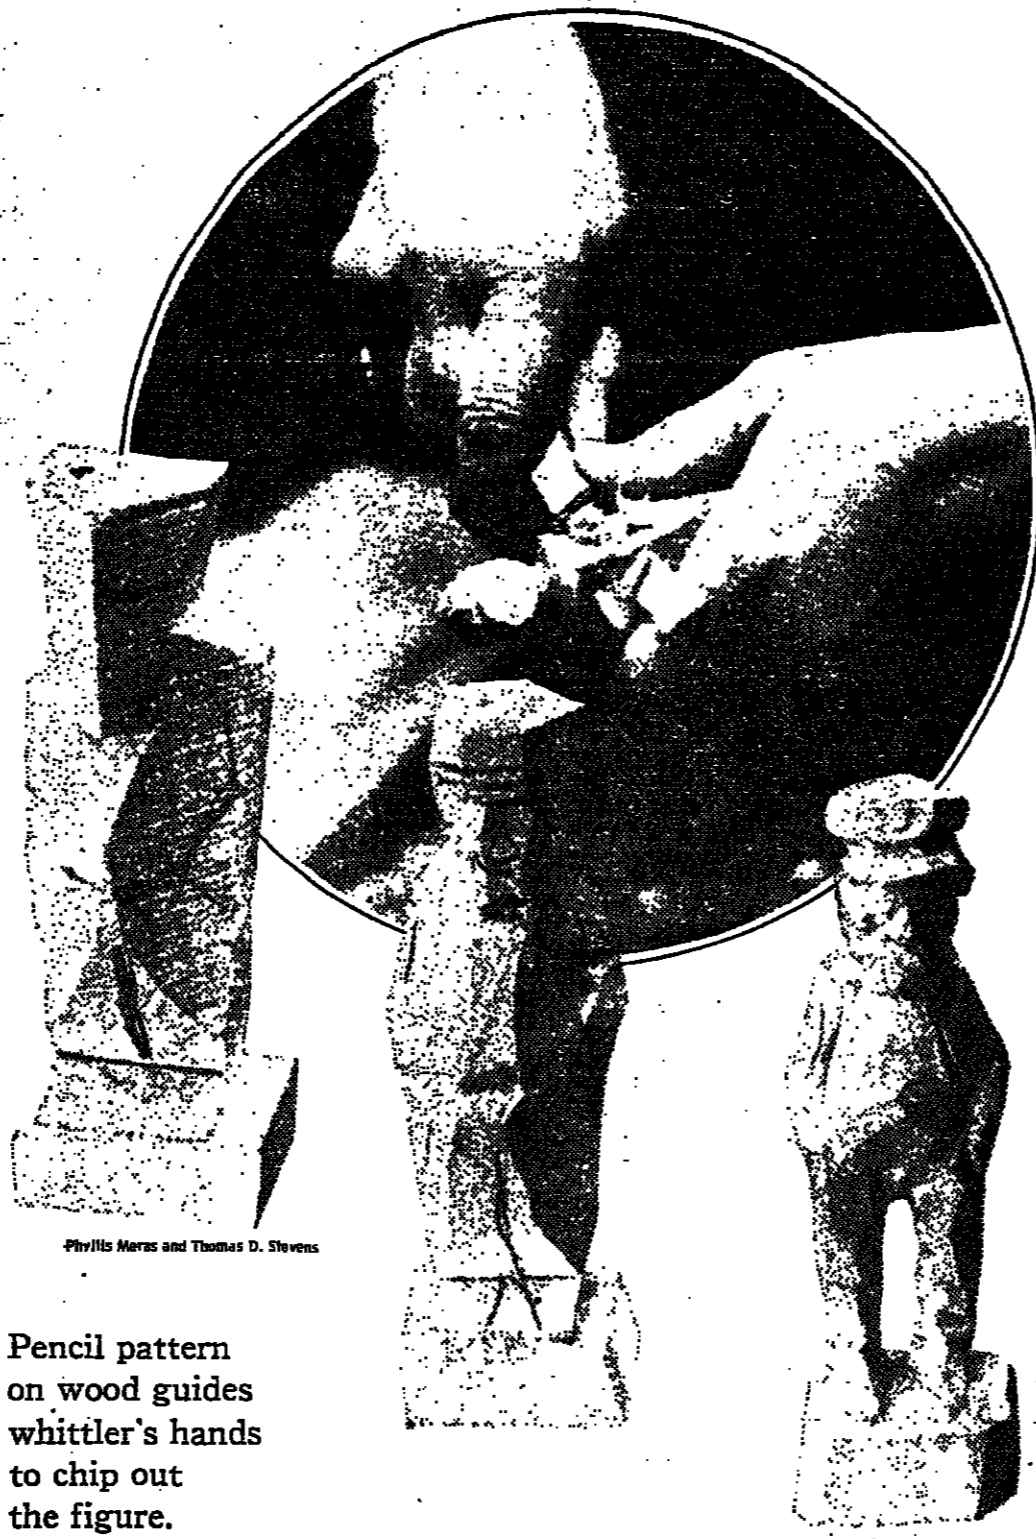

On rainy days when I was a child, my father would hand my brother and me a cake of Ivory soap, a table knife and some sheets of newspaper to work on, then suggest that we go out on the porch and whittle some animals. My brother was a far better whittler than I was, and frequently produced cooey figures that actually resembled a horse, a lion, a cat with curled-up tail, and so on. Today, in his middle years, and seeking a hobby that might also be profitable, my father has returned to those days and has again started whittling, though now his medium is wood.

The membership of the National Woodcarvers Association, which is headquartered at 7274 Miami Ave., Cincinnati, Ohio 45243, reports that their membership is now more than double what it was in 1970, and about a year ago the National Carvers Museum was opened in Colorado (14960 Woodcarver Rd., Monument, Colo. 80132). The museum now displays the works of 3,600 American whittlers, carvers and wood sculptors and offers courses (on the premises, as well as by correspondence) in whittling.

Whittling involves holding the wood in one hand while the knife that is used to cut or shape it is held in the other hand; carving calls for laying the wood on a flat surface and chipping away at it with a chisel (and sometimes with a knife). The woods favored by most whittlers and/or carvers are basswood, which can be had for $5.60 for a two-inch thick, six-inch-wide, 18-inch long piece; butternut which costs $5.95 for a piece of the same size; and white pine which costs $7.95.

These are typical sizes stocked by mail order specialty houses which sell wood for whittling or carving. Of the three, basswood is generally advised as being best for the beginning whittler or carver because

Elegant Endive Can Be Grown Indoors

By DORIS FABER

We are picking some elegant salads from our basement now and only because we read the seed catalogues carefully. What we are growing is the succulent French endive, a Belgian delicacy, listed by American seed growers as Witloof chicory! Our chicory is closely related to the common blue-flowered weed that beautifies country roadsides every July, which proves there is no trick to growing it. Gardeners merely have to give up about 20 feet of a garden row for the entire summer and provide a suitable forcing habitat indoors during the winter months for the harvested roots.

The reward will be crispy tart, but not bitter, tight little clusters of creamy leaves, the very same gourmet delight that sells at fine markets for approximately a dollar a pound. Our roots produce enough for dozens of meals for a total cost around 40 cents.

Endive has never become widely popular, except in Europe where it's much cheaper. Most retailers of seeds in this country don't even bother offering it on their racks. By mail, though, major companies such as Harris and Stokes and Burpee do make it available, if anyone can manage to locate the right listing in their catalogues.

Alphabetical logic must be sacrificed to the printer's convenience when this variety of chicory is being described. In a rough sort of way, I found it included among the "C's," but one catalog has it right after broccoli and just before cabbage, another between corn and collards, a third between collards and corn.

When the seed packet arrives, merely set it aside until some day in late May or early June when there are fewer garden chores. Plant the seeds outside in any reasonably sunny and fertile area.

A few weeks later, thin the resulting sprigs so they're about four inches apart and toss the thinnings into a salad for a pleasing tang.

Let the chicory grow on. The leaves will become too sharp and tough for most palates. The lush coarse growth is nourishing each plant's roots, the goal during this stage of endive culture.

The roots will develop into gray "carrots," sometimes pronged or gnarled instead of smoothly carrot-shaped. After the tops are withered by frost, but before the ground freezes hard, dig them up.

The next important step is to find a frostproof repository to store the roots. For

Part II—Humidity

By BERNARD GLADSTONE

(This is the second half of a two-part story on condensation and mildew problems in the home.)

Condensation inside the house can not only lead to the development of mildew and hard-to-get-rid-of musty odors in closed off or unheated spaces, it can also cause staining of plaster, peeling of paint and rotting of wood structural members. Last week's column on this page explained how the homeowner can minimize condensation problems inside hollow wall spaces, and in unfinished attics and crawl spaces, in two ways: (1) by installing vapor barriers to keep warm, moist indoor air from penetrating the walls and the insulation; and (2) by providing adequate ventilation of the spaces above and behind the insulation so that moisture vapor which does penetrate can escape harmlessly to the outside.

However, the more common and annoying problem of getting rid of condensation on windows requires a different solution. Since moisture vapor from inside the house condenses on window glass because it is much colder than other interior surfaces (much as a glass of iced tea "sweats" on a summer day), one obvious solution is to try and keep the glass from getting so cold—and in most cases this can be done by the installation of snug fitting storm windows on the outside.

If windows protected by storm sash still develop condensation on the outside of the glass (or the inside of the storm sash) then it could be that the weatherstripping around the main window is not adequate and thus is allowing warm, moisture-laden air from inside to leak out where it then condenses on the outside glass.

Window (and door) condensation problems are particularly acute when the windows (or doors) have metal frames. Metal being an excellent conductor of heat tends to lose indoor heat so rapidly that the inside surfaces get ice cold—so cold that it may even cause frost to form on the inside. Storm sash on the outside will help, but it may not be enough in very cold weather. (The newer metal windows and doors have a "thermal barrier" that keeps heat from being transferred from inside to outside, thus preventing this to a great extent.)

Another way to minimize the problem of condensation forming on windows is to try and keep indoor humidity levels down. Although most experts recommend an indoor relative humidity of 30 to 40 percent as being most comfortable when outside temperatures are below freezing (and indoor temperatures are maintained at a level of 68 to 70 degrees), at this level condensation will still occur on windows when outside temperatures drop down close to zero. To minimize this, exhaust

HOW TO REMOVE MILDEW
MATERIAL	TREATMENT
Mattresses, Rugs and Upholstery	If possible take item outside. Brush off loose mold, or use vacuum and empty bag outside. If item is damp, dry with heater and fan. Wipe mildewed areas with solution of half-and-half denatured alcohol and water; dry thoroughly, then spray with fungicidal (anti-mildew) spray. On carpets use rug shampoo and allow to dry thoroughly before using anti-mildew spray.
Clothing and Fabric	Hang outside and brush off loose mold, then wash or dry clean. If spots remain, try removing with mixture of lemon juice and salt; spread on then lay out in sun to dry and rinse thoroughly. If safe, for fabric, laundry bleach can also be used.
Leather Goods	Wipe with solution of half-and-half denatured alcohol and water, then hang outside (or in current of air) to dry. Wash with saddle soap; sponge with damp cloth, then allow to dry.
Wood and Painted Surfaces	Use fan or heater to dry thoroughly if possible, then scrub with solution made by mixing three quarts water with one quart fresh laundry bleach, to which is added about 6 tablespoons trisodium phosphate. Scrub on, allow to dry, then rinse well. Protect with wood preservative or mildew-resistant paint.
Books and Paper Goods	Dry thoroughly by placing near mild heat or in sunlight. Remove loose mold by wiping with clean cloth. If paper is washable, sponge with soapuds, then pat dry. Stains can be removed with a solution of household bleach or by using ink eradicator, but test in corner first.

fans should be used in kitchens, laundries and bathrooms to get rid of moisture vapor when bathing, cooking or washing, and air from outside should be admitted by opening windows slightly at regular intervals.

The need for ventilation is particularly acute in basements, attics, utility rooms and other spaces that are unheated—even if condensation is slight during cold weather it will be enough to cause mildew and musty odors to develop (especially if the rooms are used for storing furniture and/or clothing). If ventilating is impractical, or undesirable, then the next best bet is to install a dehumidifier in these areas—or use bags of moisture-absorbing chemicals (sold in hardware and department stores). Mild heat—especially in closets and basements—also helps, not only to combat condensation, but also to prevent the growth of mildew.

Mildew is actually a living fungus or mold spore that grows where there is a lack of light and warmth, combined with dampness and something on which it can grow or feed. Although it thrives best on organic materials such as paint, fabric, leather or wood, it can also grow on many synthetic materials which are covered with even a slight film of dirt, grease or moisture.

Therefore, one of the best defenses, after providing adequate ventilation, and a mild form of heat (in a closet leaving a light bulb burning will often be enough), is to make certain stored items are clean and dry. Chemical mildew inhibitors, which come in spray form as well as in powdered form, will help, but airing items out regularly and removing those that have the slightest sign of mildew is still essential to keep spores from spreading. (The chart above tells how to remove mildew spots and stains from many common household articles.)

Musty odors, which are a result of mold growth, are much more difficult to get rid of. The best solution is to ventilate the area as thoroughly as possible, using fans if necessary, and to apply mild heat where practical. In basements and similar places, spreading chlorinated lime also helps, as does placing shallow pans of baking soda around (these powders should be swept up when the odor disappears or diminishes). Aerosol sprays of the kind sold for use in deodorizing kitchens and bathrooms can also be used.

"Remember, once something's been cut away, it can't be put back again."

As the work progresses—if it is a figure that is being whittled—one shoulder should be balanced against the other; the arms and hands on one side should be whittled to match the arms and hands on the other. "Eyeball your work," is Duncan Hannah's advice to neophyte whittlers to keep parts in proportion. In making figures, he explains, one trick is to be sure that the head comprises about a fifth of the whole piece. Otherwise there will be no room for details. "The head's the eye-catcher," Mr. Hannah says. "That's where most people look." The torso and head make up about half of most small carvings; the legs are the bottom half.

After the piece is done, it can be finished with boiled linseed oil, wax or varnish, or it can be painted. Most woodworkers prefer oil colors diluted with linseed oil or paint thinner to make a stain for faces, and acrylic paints for clothing. "If you make a mistake with acrylics you can paint over it with the next color," Hannah says. Oils should be buffed to a good sheen after they are applied, but no buffing is necessary for acrylics.

Home Clinic

Q: I plan to use the front end of my basement, which has 12-inch concrete block walls, for a watch and clock repair shop. In summer I will need to keep the moisture content of the air down to keep small parts and tools from rusting, and in winter I will want to heat the area. My question is: would it be advisable to find a touch-up in the right color, though you can check with plumbing fixture dealers in your community. The only other choice then would be to paint the entire sinks with an epoxy paint.

Q: Can you tell me how to repair the porcelain on an old cast iron sink?—N.S., Flushing, N.Y.

A: I assume you are referring to one or two chips in the porcelain that let the black iron show through. If the sink is white, you can use any of the porcelain touch-up materials that are sold in paint and hardware stores, but follow directions on the package exactly. If the sink is colored, it will be almost impossible to find a touch-up in the right color, though you can check with plumbing fixture dealers in your community. The only other choice then would be to paint the entire sinks with an epoxy paint.

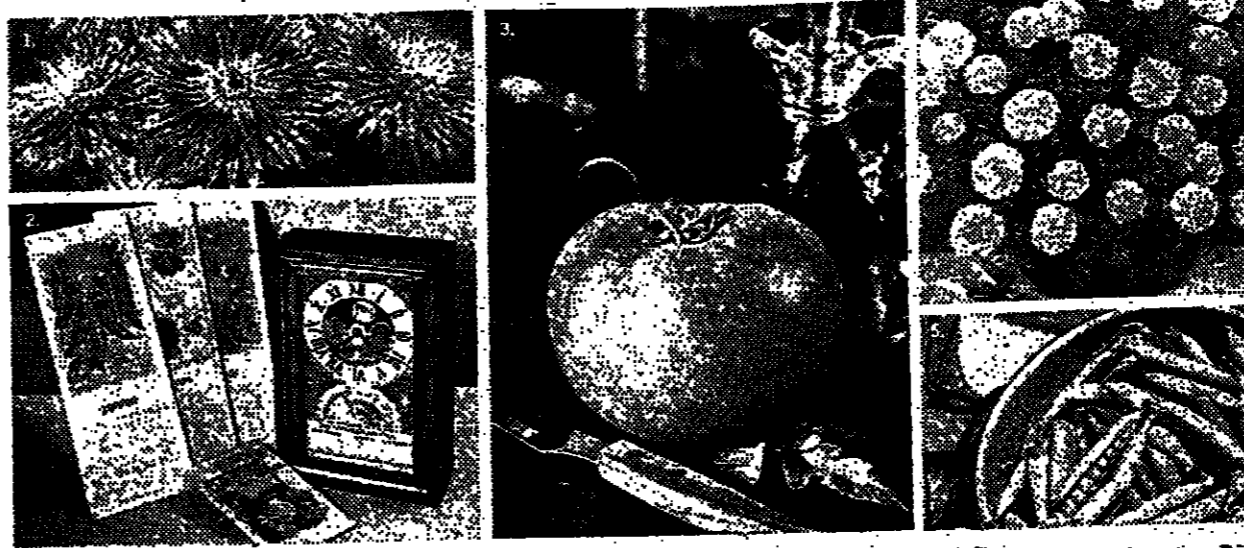

Q: We live near the water and as a result have a recurring problem with mold developing on the paneling of our sunroom each summer. The paneling is a dark brown wood and appears to have no finish on it other than an oil stain. Is there some sealer or varnish we can apply over this wood to prevent the growth of mold again next summer?—Mrs. E.C., East Setauket, N.Y.

A: First scrub the surface down to get rid of any mold or dirt that remains, using a solution made by mixing three part water with one part liquid bleach and a little powdered detergent. Then rinse and allow to dry. Next, apply two coats of either varnish or a penetrating wood sealer—but test these first to see if they will dry, since you don't know what kind of oil or stain is on the surface. If they won't dry, apply a first coat of shellac, then varnish (don't use a penetrating sealer in this case).

Questions about home repair problems should be addressed to: Home Improvement Department, The New York Times, Times Square, New York, N.Y. 10036. Only those questions of general interest will be answered here.

AROUND THE Garden

JOAN LEE FAUST

... comes quietly at first, just a few flakes. The snowflakes, carbocids and roadways are dusted. The wind blows easily, the white dust scatters. If the wind persists, the flakes keep falling. Some of the tops of the hemlocks but the trees manage to hold on. The holly holds up its leaves to catch the crystals and they stay, little puffs on every branch.

... continues. Soon the hemlocks can no longer hold the persistent dusting and they too soon are covered in shrouds of white puff. The evergreens are the last to give in. They are shaking off the white flakes and little by little the largest branches, then the smallest.

... when the snowing stops, the trees, the holly, the holly are dressed in new white. The Sugar Plum fairy has come alive once again, in white.

Vegetables

... were successful growing vegetables on the terrace certainly enthusiastic and are sure to do better things this summer. The plants that best will be the ones to concentrate on. Gardeners reported superb crops from tomatoes, melons, lettuce, peppers, cucumbers and even

... that took up the most space and were disappointing were those requiring deep soil especially corn, beans, peas and all the vine melons, watermelons and pumpkins. These to the country cousins who have the space for these space taker uppers to sprawl.

Answers/Questions

GERANIUM CUTTINGS (Dec. 14)
P. M. B., Valley Stream, N. Y., wondered why rooted geranium cuttings yellowed and died a few weeks after planting them in sterile soil. There are three possible reasons. One, the cuttings were not rooted before being planted. Two, the cuttings were not rooted before being planted. Three, the cuttings were not rooted before being planted.

DOORS (Dec. 14)
View Brunswick, N. J., has been successful in growing plants indoors but when they come into the house they drop off. He wondered why. H. H. New York State reader, also grows tomatoes and has observed that the first sets up or fall off without developing. Too much water may be present in the soil.

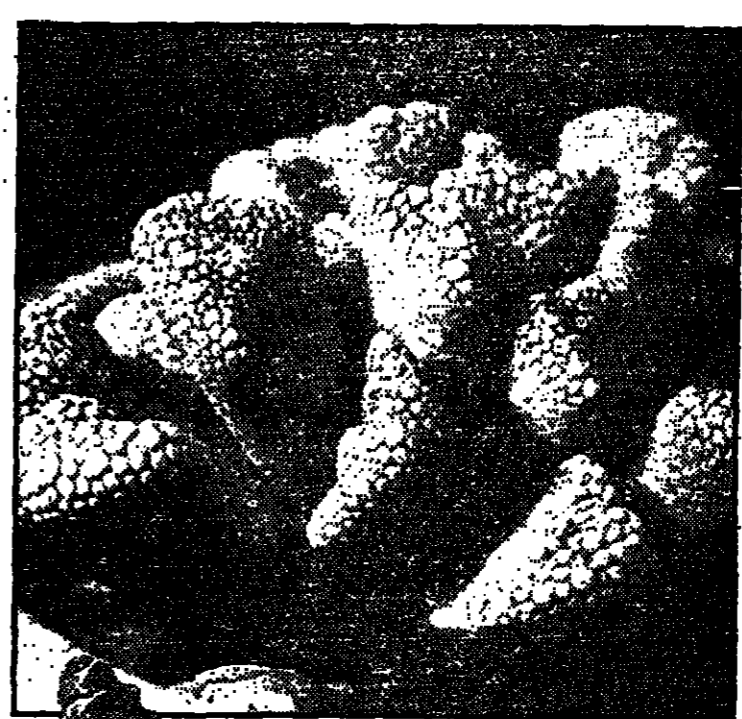

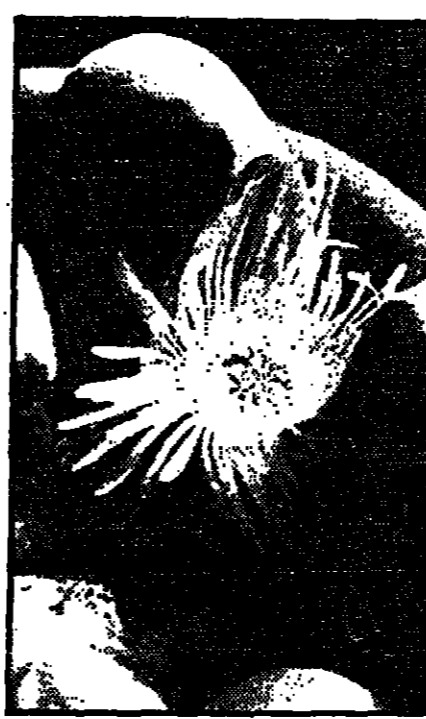

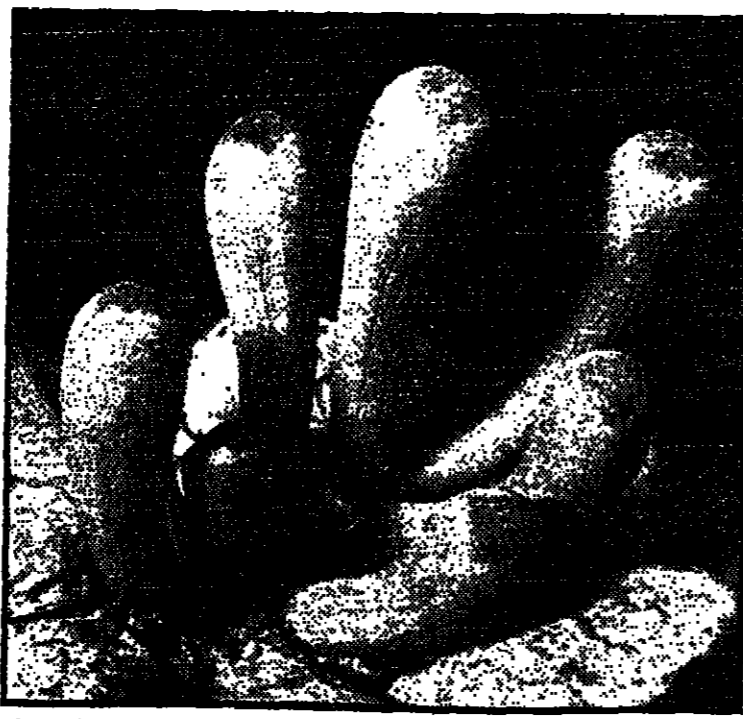

LCH (Dec. 14)
N. Y. asked if he should allow dropped plants to stay on the soil as a mulch or moved. Mrs. Marion Irtzary, a Connecticut reader, "Plant hygiene is extremely important. All dead leaves and stems should be removed. Moist conditions of the home aid the soil pests which feed on decaying materials in roots."

TERN (Dec. 28)
Jan, has had a rabbit's foot fern for a while which is growing well, no furry rhizomes which give the fern its common name. Brooklyn, N. Y. had a similar problem by putting the fern in a warmer place. The ferns several times a week with room temperature water. "Evidently these ferns require more water than others and now thrive in my soil. I never fertilize them."

AND PLANTS
On vacation, our two Siamese (fed by a cat) took revenge and used our dracaena as a litter box. Now the plants' leaves are yellow. What can we do to save the plants?
N. Y.

... $50 worth of tulips, crocus, and never planted. How can we save or store fall or for spring planting? E.J.H.

... and answers are provided by readers. His column should be addressed to Garden Questions, 239 W. 43d St., New York, N.Y. 10018. Please include a stamped, addressed envelope.

John Hopkins

Flowering 'Stones'

By JOHN HOPKINS

From the arid regions of South Africa come plants which are so strange, they are called living stones, flowering stones or mimiry plants. These stemless succulents resemble small, weathered pebbles, perfect camouflage in their native habitat of broken quartzite or limestone rocks.

Best known are the many species of Lithops or stone faces. Each plant has a single pair of leaves, fused but for a narrow cleft at the top and forming an inverted cone. The flat tops are tinged russet, brown or blue-grey with irregular markings to give the appearance of split stones. In the wild most of the plant is buried and the translucent upper surface acts as a window, allowing sunlight to reach the underground photosynthetic cells.

Lithops have an annual growth cycle, forming a new pair of leaves and absorbing the old. The new leaves form in the fall, growing inside the plant and become visible when they force open the fissure in the upper surface. Then the old leaves are slowly absorbed and by late summer the plant is ready to flower and begin another cycle.

Long rooted, Lithops are at their best grown as a group in a deep bowl. Pebbles placed between the plants add to their unusual appearance. In contrast, many of the Conophytums or cone plants are mottled spheres with a tiny cleft at the top. Others are flattened or indented, while C. proximum and C. meyeri are bilobed and resemble sculptured 'Y's. With age, many form compact clumps that may contain over 50 heads. Each year their bodies shrivel and appear quite dead, while new leaves develop inside and break through the old skin.

Other mimiry plants do not shrivel so severely and have two or even three pairs of succulent leaves, each forming a V with flat inner surfaces. They are oval or round in the pale green Argyrodemas and the blue-grey Dinteranthus vanzijli or D. pole-evanasi, elongated and keeled in some Pleiosiphis species and Lapidaria margaritae. This last is hard to the touch and pale green, becoming tinged pink in strong sunlight. Pleiosiphis are mottled and resemble granite chips.

The jewel plants (Titanopsis) have loose rosettes of thick leaves, narrow at the base but broad and flat at the tip. The ends are covered with glistening white bumps in T. calcarea. T. ostridae has larger protuberances and reddish tints, while T. setifera has small teeth on the edges of the leaves.

Baby toes (Fenestraria rhopalophylla) has several pairs of club shaped leaves with flat, translucent tips. Growing in sand dunes on the coast of South West Africa, these plants are completely buried except for their windows, which look like flat pebbles.

Tiger's jaws (Faucaria tigrina) has several pairs of broad, keeled leaves stacked inside each other and with teeth along the inner edges. They soon form attractive clumps.

Mimiry plants are easy to grow if given sun, some fresh air, and practically no water. Rot is a real danger. Flowering stones should have a light watering each time the soil has dried out when they are growing and no water at all during their dormant phase.

John Hopkins is a research fellow working in developmental biology.

completely disappeared, and other types when there is new growth. Allow the plants to become dormant after the year's pair of leaves have formed, or the plants will become elongated and unnatural.

Avoid getting water on the leaves and do not bury baby toes and Lithops to imitate their natural habitat or they will rot. Baby toes should be watered by immersing the pot in a dish of water, as overhead watering can be fatal.

Use a soil mix of three parts coarse sand to one part potting soil or oak leafmold. Baby toes can be grown in pure sand. Small pots are best and they should have a layer of pebbles or shards in the bottom to ensure good drainage.

Place the plants in a south facing window or other sunny spot. In summer they will thrive outdoors if protected from rain and birds. They need a minimum temperature of 45 to 50 degrees in winter.

Mimiry plants can be grown from seed, but it is a slow process. It's one way to obtain a good number of healthy plants cheaply. Fill small pots with the sandy mix, press the soil down firmly and soak thoroughly. Add a thin layer of gritty sand and sprinkle the seeds on the surface. Spray lightly to ensure all the seeds have fallen down between sand granules. Keep the soil moist and at a temperature of at least 70 degrees. Seeds should germinate in a few days to two weeks. Young seedlings should be protected from direct sunlight and kept moist by placing the pots in a dish containing a little water, as they are too delicate to survive overhead watering. When about a year old they will be large enough to be pricked out with safety and replanted in individual pots. Clumping types can be propagated by separating the individual plants of a cluster and replanting in separate pots.

An excellent source of mimiry plants is Ed Storms, 4223 Pershing, Fort Worth, Tex. 76107 (free list available on request). Seeds can be brought from the New Mexico Cactus Research, Belen, N.M. 87002 (50¢ for catalog). Or mixed packets are available from Park Seed Co., Greenwood, S. C. 29647.

Elegant Endive Grows Indoors

storage. Leave only an inch-long stub of withered greenery at the top of each root. Keep them under leaves or hay or even wads of newspaper, in either a coldframe or cool storage box.

For forcing, use any old box a foot to 18 inches deep, capable of holding moist sand or soil without deteriorating. Or line a cardboard carton with moisture-proofing plastic. As to the other dimensions of the container, since the roots can be set out barely an inch apart, an area of just two-square feet will hold a surprising number.

To extend the harvest season try succession planting with two small receptacles rather than one large. Place containers in a dim part of the cellar where the temperature ranges between 50 and 60 degrees. The next and hardest step is to carry down enough plain sand or sandy soil for filling them.

Don't do that right away, though. Put just an inch or two in the bottom of the box, then wet it well. Next, line up parallel rows of roots trimmed at the bottom to a uniform length of about eight inches and place crown upward. Spread more sand around them, and douse each layer thoroughly.

Now the experts and I differ. They say to cover the crowns with another six or seven inches of dry sand or soil, and in around three weeks, lovely heads of endive weighing about three ounces apiece will poke within an inch or so of the top surface. But I have found that, since my cellar is dark, just barely covering the crowns is enough. Within three weeks, I have lovely pale and clean heads of endive growing right up into the air.

True, I've sprinkled more water over the whole plantation whenever the surface seems to be drying, but I've had no sort of problem even when the emerging leaves get a little wet. In fact, I've formed the habit of not disturbing box number one after I've cut the first harvest because, as long as I keep on sprinkling, those roots keep right on sprouting.

Second or third growth may not be as tight or full as the first head, but the taste when sliced onto a salad plate is just the same. Delicious!

What Happened to the Balanced Budget?

Figures in Ford's New Fiscal Plan Will Be Unreal

By EDWIN L. DALE Jr.

WASHINGTON — Two years can be said with confidence about the Federal deficit to be sent to Congress this week by President Richard Nixon. Its over-all figures—total revenues and the deficit—will be essentially meaningless. The experience of the past few years has shown that the final totals vary by large amounts and in times unpredictable directions from the January document. This is a document of Congressional action, errors in printing, errors in recording, errors in estimating spending in the rollable enrollment, errors such as welfare payments and a few spending categories of interest on the debt, variations from the previous year of inflation and employment in the economy which affect both outlays and revenues.

In his sense, with our national divisions of the United States, we do not have—and really do not have—a "fiscal policy" leaving aside the major errors, the major unpredictable role of the budget makes a budget that little more than an expression of Presidential priorities and as an expression of the kind of policy he would like to see implemented by the Government.

no matter what rates in the budget may be, and no matter how the totals turn out at the end of the fiscal year, the deficit will be a very large one.

it turns out to be $40 billion or $40 billion, the deficit will be by the standards of the past two years, a huge figure for peacetime. But beyond that point, modern thinking can probably best be described as murky, or at least inconclusive, particularly on how large a deficit is "safe."

Consider, for example, the relationship of the deficit to inflation. The elementary textbooks continue to point out that the inflationary impact of a budget deficit depends in large part on how it is financed. If private investors buy the new Treasury debt, there is no more spending power in the economy than there was before and the deficit is not inflationary. But if the Federal 1980, and that was in fiscal 1969.

The deficit was quite small until it jumped to $25 billion in 1968. After dropping back markedly, it climbed to $23 billion in both fiscal 1971 and 1972, in good part as a consequence of the recession at that time.

Then, after declining with recovery to a recent low of only $5.5 billion in fiscal 1974, the deficit soared to the current "horrendous" levels, to use Mr. Simon's term, of $43.6 billion in fiscal 1975, about $70 billion in the current fiscal year and an unknown but big amount in fiscal 1977.

These numbers are large even after allowing for the growth in the economy as a whole. But have these deficits done major damage?

Perception on this crucial question differs—among economists and among politicians. There is fairly general agreement that big deficits at a time of full employment, as in 1968, are an important contributing factor to inflation. (Though economic studies discussed at the recent meeting in Dallas of the American Economic Association questioned even that bit of conventional wisdom.) There is also general agreement that a deficit of some magnitude is both inevitable and desirable at a time of recession.

But beyond that point, modern thinking can probably best be described as murky, or at least inconclusive, particularly on how large a deficit is "safe." Consider, for example, the relationship of the deficit to inflation. The elementary textbooks continue to point out that the inflationary impact of a budget deficit depends in large part on how it is financed. If private investors buy the new Treasury debt, there is no more spending power in the economy than there was before and the deficit is not inflationary. But if the Federal Reserve System directly or indirectly finances the deficit, it does so by the "printing press," adding to the nation's money supply and thus setting the stage for inflation.

What actually happened last year? The Treasury raised slightly more than $80 billion by selling new securities in calendar year 1975, a record amount for any year. This was larger than the budget deficit because the Treasury also borrows to meet expenses of off-budget agencies, such as the post office and Export-Import Bank, by way of the new Federal Financing Bank.

The Federal Reserve acquired some $7 billion of this debt in the normal course of its open market operations. But there was no explosion of the nation's money supply. The narrowly defined money supply (M-1, demand deposits and currency) grew by only 4.2 percent from the end of 1974 to the end of 1975. By the broader definition (M-2, which includes commercial bank time and savings deposits), the growth was 8.8 percent, on the high side historically but well within the Federal Reserve's own target range.

Inflation actually diminished somewhat in 1975 and most predictions are for a further reduction of the inflation rate in 1976. Thus it will be hard to prove a direct

Labor Power In the Elections

By DAMON STEINSON

The Communications Workers of America, which used to have one political action committee, transferred $104,000 last summer to its 12 districts to set up a political action committee in each.

The small, 10,000-member Marine Engineers Beneficial Association reported more than $450,000 in cash, derived from members' voluntary contributions, available for political purposes.

Two committees of the United Automobile Workers have listed a total of $647,000 in cash-on-hand for political activities, and the political action committee of the United Steelworkers of America reported $344,000.

Altogether, according to union reports to the new Federal Election Commission, even at this early stage in the 1976 political year unions have nearly $4 million in cash ready. This is money from voluntary contributions; it doesn't reflect coming drives to get every member in the 14.5 million American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations to contribute $2 for political action committees.

All this is part of organized labor's determined drive to raise money and mobilize manpower to elect a Democratic President and Congress in the face of an expected flood of pro-Republican money from big business.

Despite impressive figures indicating past contributions of labor—$8.5 million in 1972 by one report—and its future financial potential, A.F.L.-C.I.O. officials contend that labor never matched business and industry contributions, including unreported or previously illegal corporate spending, primarily to the Republican Party and its candidates.

"We never could compete with business and industry in the past," said Bernard Albert, an official of the A.F.L.-C.I.O.'s political arm, national COPE. "Now (under recent rulings of the Federal Election Commission) they can proliferate (political money-raising) committees ad nauseam."

The Election Commission has ruled that companies may spend their own funds to finance solicitation of contributions from stockholders and employees for the companies' political action committees. The commission also said they could make any political contributions they saw fit so long as the monies came from funds collected by political committees through voluntary contributions.

This was a landmark step that extended to companies the rights that labor had long had in soliciting and contributing funds for political purposes.

The number of business political committees is growing fast, but labor, too, is increasing its political committees to operate more effectively under the Federal Election Campaign Act amendments of 1974. (Each individual committee can make a $5,000 contribution to an individual candidate under the new law, explaining the emphasis on adding committees.)

In 1975, for example, business and financial groups organized 107 new political committees for support of more than one candidate, while unions added 48 more according to the Election Commission.

"Now it's workers' volunteer dollars against big business' dollar deluge," the International Ladies Garment Workers Union said. Some labor leaders fear management could pressure employees for donations. But Albert Zack, spokesman for the A.F.L.-C.I.O. said corporations might find it difficult to get employees to contribute.

Merrill Lynch: The Largest Gets Stronger

By RICHARD PHALON

From his office on the 46th floor of the Merrill Lynch & Company building at 165 Broadway, Donald T. Regan, head of the nation's biggest brokerage firm, commands a view that sweeps over lower Manhattan and miles of the New Jersey littoral. Mr. Regan is so high up that even on an overcast day he can see toy-like tankers picking their way through the Narrows toward the Verrazano Bridge.

The 57-year-old Mr. Regan, who has spent all of his working life at Merrill Lynch, makes the view seem symbolic. "We're No. 1," he says, softly tapping his desk for emphasis and ticking off the areas in which the Thundering Herd shows the competition a clean drive of heels.

The list is a formidable one, and Merrill is a lot more than just the nation's biggest broker. It almost single-handedly pushed the industry away from fixed commission rates to the negotiated rates that went into effect last May. It sharply challenged the New York Stock Exchange's unwillingness to automate, and has even proposed a design for a new electronic central market some competitors contend only Merrill could live with.

Mr. Regan takes a Darwinian view of competition. He thinks it will result in a diminishing number of brokerage firms that will be graduating from Harvard College and serving with the Marine Corps in the South Pacific during World War II, enumerates the firm's superlatives with relish.

Merrill, which traces its origins back some 150 years to a small brokerage in Richmond, is the nation's biggest securities firm by far. "Our capital position," notes Mr. Regan, "is more than four times" as big as Salomon Brothers, Merrill's next largest competitor—around $546 million compared with $123.7 million.

Merrill also has a huge sales edge—$800.6 million total revenues in 1974 compared with $184 million for second-ranking E. F. Hutton & Company. Backed by an advertising and marketing budget that runs to more than $17.5 million a year, Merrill Lynch is Wall Street's best-known name. It has 1.5 million customers.

"The comparison with General Motors has been made," says Mr. Regan with a grin, "but modestly forbids me to make it myself." Like G.M., Merrill Lynch appears to be increasing its market penetration at the expense of the competition. Last year the firm did between 11 and 12 percent of all public round-lot volume on the Big Board and better than 26 percent of the odd lots—orders involving fewer than 100 shares.

Merrill owes much of its success to a single-minded effort to diversify out of the boom-and-bust environment of its traditional commission business.

Commissions are nonetheless still very important to Merrill. Generated by the listed and over-the-counter securities, mutual funds, commodities futures and options the firm buys and sells for customers, they have continued to show steady growth.

In 1970 Merrill grossed $229.7 million in commissions. By 1974 the figure had risen to $292 million, but because the firm has been pushing both internal and external diversification so hard, commissions declined to 36.5 percent of Merrill's total revenues from 46.1 percent.

Mr. Regan says he wouldn't mind seeing commissions drop to as low as 25 percent of the total business so long as they keep rising in absolute dollar terms. Diversification, he adds, is the key to survival on Wall Street. "There will be no large firms doing only a brokerage business," he predicts.

Merrill Lynch began diversifying in the early 1960's when Mr. Regan, who had moved from sales into administration, was made an executive vice-president.

There have been only five domestic acquisitions in the past 10 years, but one of them made Merrill a force to deal with in Government and money market securities. The acquisitions also took Merrill into real estate syndication, economic consulting, mortgage insurance and precious metals.

In pursuit of its new role as a packager of financial services, Merrill has put together what is probably the broadest product mix on Wall Street. The goal is not only to reduce dependence on the volatile commission business, but also to cover high fixed costs—offices and salesmen, mainly—with as wide an array of goods as possible.

The diversification strategy has helped make Merrill a kind of gigantic money machine. It got into merchant banking in London, Iran and Hong Kong, for example, to help service American corporate underwriting clients who have themselves diversified by expanding abroad.

The growing overseas base, in turn, enabled Merrill to pick off a sizable chunk of foreign government underwriting it had never done before, while its merchant banking arms are sniffing out still other corporate underwriting opportunities.

Some of the switch in Merrill's profit mix has been inadvertent. Rising interest rates generally—and the concomitant increase in the rates that Merrill has been enjoying on customers' margin account borrowings and on its huge portfolio of Government securities—have made a big difference in the shape of things. Between 1970 and 1974, Merrill's total interest revenues expanded to $230.7 million from $6.4 million, or to 28.8 percent of revenues from 17.3 percent.

Merrill's own interest costs, of course, were rising, too—to 26.6 percent of total revenue.

The 'Thundering Herd' Tramples on Its Wall Street Competitors

"the larger and stronger" for the bloodletting the industry is now going through.

He regards Merrill's firsts as the best sign of the firm's ability to survive and prosper.

Last year, for example, Merrill Lynch for the first time edged out the Chase Manhattan Bank to rank as the nation's biggest underwriter of municipal bonds. That first goes with the first in dollar volume of corporate underwritings Merrill racked up three years ago—a distinction it continues to hold—after less than a decade in the business against such deeply entrenched old-line competitors as the First Boston Corporation and Morgan Stanley & Company.

Mr. Regan, who joined Merrill Lynch in 1946 after

The Winds of January on Wall Street

By JOHN H. ALLAN

As January goes, so goes the year.
 This little maxim has a lot of appeal in Wall Street these days, for the tremendous surge in stock prices early in the new year makes it almost impossible to see January winding up with a loss for the month. In the first 10 trading days of 1976, the Dow Jones industrial average soared more than 70 points, climbing above 900 to its highest level in more than two years.
 Breaking past 900 isn't such a great achievement, of course. The Dow first did it 10 years ago, and it has done it seven times since then. Nevertheless, stockbrokers are making the most of the fact that January burst off of the starting blocks with unusual speed this year.
 It's hard, they contend, to believe that 1976—the year of the Bicentennial, the year of a Presidential election—will not be a success for stock market investors.

 The postwar record is comforting. The stock market, as measured by the Dow Jones industrial average, has ended a year the same way it went in January in the vast majority of cases since 1950.
 The year followed the month about 80 percent of the time. Five down-Januaries were followed by five down-years; 15 up-Januaries were followed by 15 up-years.
 The Dow doublecrossed investors only six times. In January of 1966, 1968 and 1974 rising prices gave way to losses later in the year. In 1956, 1968 and 1970, the Dow stily surprised the stock market by retreating in January and then regaining its strength to finish the year with gains.
 From the postwar record, then, the odds seem to be 5-to-1 that a stock market

advance in January will be followed by a gain for the full year. These odds have to be shaded, however, by the fact that so many of the exceptions to the rule have occurred in the last 10 years. The market form has been much truer through the 1950's and early 1960's.

 The surprisingly strong surge in the stock market during the opening days of 1976 stems chiefly from two factors — rising corporate profits and lower interest rates.
 Corporate profits are generally expected to continue rising throughout the year, and they should provide strong underpinning to the stock market until security analysts begin to get a clearer notion how earnings will shape up in 1977.
 Interest rates have declined much more quickly and more sharply than the credit markets had generally anticipated. Even so, the consensus holds that rates, while tending to come down a little more this winter, will turn around and begin rising during the spring or early summer.
 The decline in rates means the automatic appeal of buying relatively riskless bonds has eroded and so the stock market has benefited. If the consensus is correct, however, fixed-income securities will regain their luster later this year, which would tend to take some strength away from the stock market.
 The economic research department at Chemical Bank last week published interest rate projections through March 1977, and indicated that it thought short-term rates would hit their lows for the entire 15-month period during the current month.
 By the end of the period, rates on Treasury bills would have climbed to 8.13 percent from the current 4.8 percent. Other rates would climb, too, and yields on high-grade utility bonds would reach 9.4 percent, up from 8.5 percent now, according to the projections.

 The stock market's outlook hinges on more than interest rates, however. The condition of the economy, the election and inflation will all influence upon the market's performance. So will international politics, developments in the energy field, New York's financial problems and labor contract settlements.
 Wall Street has clearly been surprised by the sharp price rises of this January. The market had waffled for six months, getting nowhere and causing many market

Struthers Wells and Secondary Oil Recovery

Struthers Wells pioneered the development of commercial size steam generators for secondary oil recovery during the early 1960s. Since that time its Struthers Thermo-Flood subsidiary has continued to set the industry's engineering and performance standards on secondary oil recovery steam generators for both domestic and export installations.

Worldwide Fertilizers. Power. Petroleum. Environment. Energy Recovery.

Domestic companies planning overseas installations can also secure the same Struthers Wells' engineering expertise and fabrication know-how that is available in the United States, in many of the major industrial countries of the world. The following equipment is available through the Paris engineering and sales office of Struthers Wells, or through our competent licensees:

- Feedwater heaters for commercial fossil fuel and nuclear power plants.
- Auxiliary heat exchangers for commercial power plants.
- Ammonia and urea plant Multiflow® reactors and high pressure heat exchangers.
- High pressure refinery and petrochemical heat exchangers.
- Secondary oil recovery steam generators.
- Phosphoric acid crystallizers.
- Fire tube and water tube process waste heat boilers.
- Incinerator waste heat boilers.
- Waste stream evaporators and crystallizers.
- Gas turbine waste heat boilers.
- Process furnaces.

If you are planning a new overseas or domestic facility or thinking of expanding an existing one, Struthers Wells' designs are probably available to you near your plant.

France Turns Amenable on Money

By CLYDE H. FARNSWORTH

PARIS—The obstreperous orneriness has shifted to sweet reasonableness. France has stopped being the odd man out in international monetary matters, and the question many are asking these days is why.

The new position showed up dramatically at the Jamaica meeting earlier this month of the International Monetary Fund where floating currency rates were legalized and gold was formally dethroned from the divine right absolutism of Gaudist days.

In assessing the changes that have led to a closing of Western ranks after the bitter French-American conflicts of the last decade, both French and American analysts point to the healing powers of the pragmatism that has become the hallmark of French President Valéry Giscard d'Estaing in managing a complex economy during a serious recession.

But not all the differences between the opposing French and American concepts of monetary order have been buried. The French are still betting that the United States will eventually come round to their way of thinking.

And the Jamaica accord was deliberately framed to give Washington and Paris the chance to prove their respective points in future years.

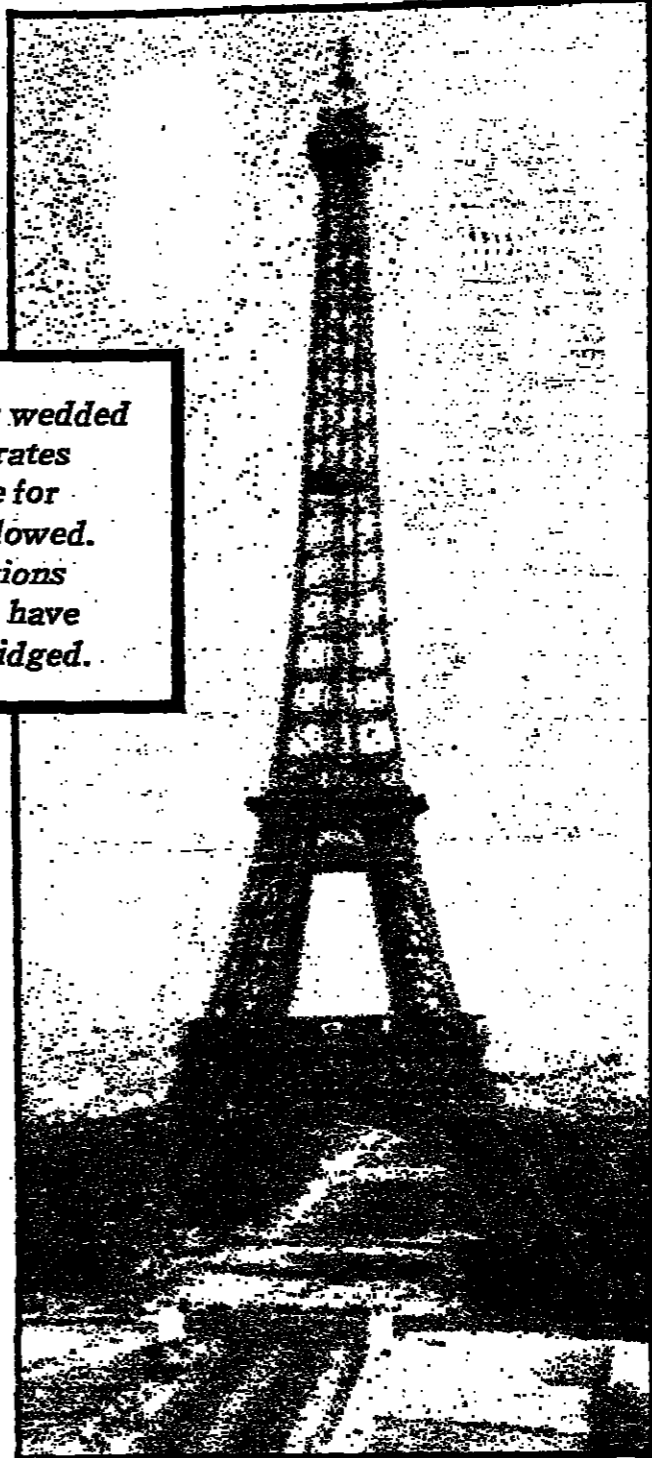

In President Giscard d'Estaing's view, monetary discord was a major contributing factor to the economic disturbances in the West. He called last November's important economic summit meeting, at the Rambouillet Chateau, just outside of Paris last November, essentially to end the ancient French-American quarrels and get the kind of agreement that was wrapped up in Jamaica.

The French, and other Europeans, have traditionally attached far greater importance to monetary relationships than have Americans, whose more self-sufficient economic position tends to de-accentuate financial relationships and debt settlements with the rest of the world.

The French had long wanted a return to a system of pegged exchange rates, in which countries undertake to keep their currencies within a certain margin of fixed values. This would provide the stability that would inspire the confidence to get world trade moving again, they said.

The United States argued that fixed rates were impossible so long as national Paris, once firmly wedded to fixed currency rates and an official role for gold, appears mellowed. But neither its options nor its arguments have been seriously abridged.

economies, which in the end determine currency values, were performing so disparately.

A top French banker, asked why Paris had now accepted the principle of floating rates, replied with Giscardian pragmatism that, "Our industrialists discovered they could hold their own under floating rates. The world hadn't come to an end."

As evidence of that survival, the French recorded a trade surplus last year, despite the vast increases in worldwide oil prices and in the face of virtually unanimous expectations that they would be in deficit. One of the reasons, of course, was that the recession cut imports. But exports, especially to oil-producing nations, were considered impressively resilient.

In addition, the French recognized they could never force the United States to accept a regime of fixed rates and that if they insisted they would only deepen the conflict.

French analysts point out that the increasing importance of foreign trade to the American economy—especially after the oil price increases—will in time, make the United States see the light.

They point out, for instance, that exports now account for 7 percent of the gross national product of the United States as opposed to only 4 percent in the mid-1960s. The comparable percentage for most of the European economies—largely because of growing intra-European trade spurred by the Common Market, is upwards of 20 percent. Japan in the mid-1960's was at 7 percent and is now at 10 percent.

In any case, there is an element of wager in the Jamaica agreement on currency rates. Under a complex double-lock combination there is a provision for a return to fixed rates when countries such as the United States decide themselves this is the thing to do.

There is also an element of wager on the gold front. The Jamaica accord—once ratified by I.M.F. member governments, which may take up to two years—formally abolishes an official price for gold.

Governments would then have the right to buy and sell it freely at whatever price they can get, probably related to the market price, which had been four times and is now three times higher than the $422.22 official price.

This is part of the French call it "ization" of the United States monetization."

As probably it private hoarders of the world, the French, seen on seeing a monetary role and in fact, and French administrators convinced it will pen anyway.

Whatever Happened The Balanced Budget connection, at least in the current period, between the massive budget deficit and inflation.

What happened, of course, was that the recession greatly reduced the demand for business short-term credit. As bank loans to business were repaid, commercial banks acquired a record $31 billion of the new Treasury debt without expanding their total loans and investment, or total deposits, by excessive amounts.

What about the concept of "crowding out"? Mr. Simon expressed fears early in the year that the Treasury could meet its huge borrowing needs only at the expense of productive private borrowing, chiefly by business.

There is no doubt that businesses with less than very good credit ratings had trouble floating long-term debt in 1975. But this was at least as much a consequence of the new quality-mindedness of investors as of the Treasury's claims on the market. The total of corporate bond floatations in 1975 reached a record of $31 billion at the same time that Treasury borrowing was so massive.

Even the net increase in municipal securities, despite New York City's troubles, was $13.4 billion last year, only a little less than in 1975 and 1974.

Crowding out has not disappeared as a problem, or at least a potential problem, though it did not seem to occur last year. Mr. Simon says that a mammoth Federal deficit will be much harder to finance this year without a crowding out effect as normal business short-term borrowing resumes. But some respected private analysts are not worried.

For example, the latest analysis of the outlook for the credit markets in 1976 by Salomon Brothers foresees another large Treasury borrowing requirement of some $67 billion this calendar year but says that this and other credit demands that are foreseeable can be met comfortably out of total national savings and a somewhat enlarged supply of bank credit. Schroder Naess & Thomas in an assessment last month took direct issue with Mr. Simon. It said that "rather than being strained, the outlook for the credit markets next year suggests that these higher demands for funds should be accommodated with little change in long term interest rates, due mainly to a very large rise in funds which we believe will be generated by the corporate sector for the second year in a row."

Only time will tell, of course. But the bond and money markets have been acting this month as if they did not expect anything like a credit crunch this year. What about the impact of the budget deficit on capital formation? This is somewhat related to crowding out and produces a wide variety of assessments and answers. A kind of middle ground view was taken by a Brookings Institution study last year. Assessing the problem of various demands for capital for investment over the years ahead—demands nearly all analyses indicate will be larger than in the past—the study concluded that the need for new capital could be met provided the Government began to run a budget surplus once reasonably full employment is restored. Source: Annual reports filed with Federal Election Commission in late 1975.

The special Senatorial election in New Hampshire last September demonstrated labor's effectiveness. There are about 45,000 union households in the state. Union workers supporting John A. Durkin, the Democratic winner, telephoned each household several times, mailed out literature, distributed absentee ballots and canvassed house-to-house in some working class districts.

Louis C. Wyman, the Republican loser, also had volunteers, but the expense of telephone banks and printing and mailing was charged against his campaign ceiling, lowering the amount for other activities. The value of labor union services in soliciting votes among union members by mail, telephone or in person and in getting out the vote on election day, didn't have to be counted as a contribution.

A study of the Citizens' Research Foundation indicated that the impact of the new restrictions on contributions of the new campaign law, limiting giving to $5,000 for a candidate from a committee and $1,000 from an individual, would be greatest—for labor and business committees—in the Presidential races.

The study showed that $1.1 million was given by labor-related committees to Presidential candidates in 1972, but under the new rules more than $300,000 of that would be over the spending limits. But of $1.3 million given to Senatorial candidates by labor committees, only $223,000 would be over today's limit. Of $2.7 million given to Congressional candidates only $129,000 would have been above today's limits.

The foundation in its book "Financing the 1972 Elections" to be published in March put labor spending in 1972 at $3.5 million against $8 million for all other groups including business, but those figures came from the filings by various special interest groups. The foundation data noted that the Seafarers International Union was the largest labor contributor to the 1972 campaign of former President Richard M. Nixon with a donation of $100,000.

In the recent past, the A.F.L.-C.I.O. hasn't been formally involved in the Presidential primaries, although individual unions and labor leaders have supported favorites. But big cash and in-kind contributions have gone to the Democratic nominee once he was chosen.

In 1972, when Senator George McGovern was the Democratic candidate, the federation remained officially neutral, although individual unions such as the auto workers, the machinists and the communications workers made substantial contributions to his campaign.

The federation theoretically removed itself from the primaries for this year when the executive council renounced involvement in Democratic Party affairs until the Presidential candidate was selected.

George Meany, president of the federation, has held to the policy of non-involvement in the selection of delegates, but he acknowledges there is a role for the many labor people who are Democrats. And he has said also that if there is a large contingent of trade union members at the Democratic national convention next July, "we will certainly try to have some influence on it."

A coalition of individual unions, working together as the Labor Coalition Clearinghouse and without objection from the federation, is embarked on a drive to elect as many delegates from labor's ranks, or friendly to labor, as possible.

The coalition includes the Communications Workers of America, the International Association of Machinists, the Graphic Arts International Union, the State, County and Municipal Employees, the International Union of Electrical Workers, the Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers, the United Mine Workers, the National Education Association and the United Automobile Workers. All except the mine workers, the education association and the auto workers are affiliated with the A.F.L.-C.I.O.

The 12 new district committees of the Communications Workers set up to skirt the new limitation on contributions by individual committees, may help that union's efforts to get labor delegates elected.

"Instead of trying to hold the money in one place," a C. W. A. spokesman said, "the decision was made to move it out to regional headquarters where our people are in tune with each state situation and so that they'll be able to put the money back into political activities in their own areas."

The coalition has not focused on any one Democratic candidate yet and probably won't, coalition sources say. The push, rather, is to utilize union funds, manpower and know-how to elect labor-oriented delegates pledged to various candidates.

"We've told our people to use their best judgment on how to become delegates," said William Holayter, political director of the International Association of Machinists. "Our main objective is to get people from unions together in various areas and to try to go in the same direction in delegate selection, so as to maximize the number we have at the convention next July."

Mr. Michael said, "When we were trying to get started, other banks couldn't grasp the potential of our situation. But Don recognized that we had the ability to make it a success. He put together a financing plan that was complex. But it worked. He arranged financing through Chemical Bank's Urban Lending Group, Chemical Bank's Factoring and Finance Division and BanCap Corporation (a bank venture capital group that invests in minority businesses).

"Once we started, we never stopped. Don got us more financing that doubled the size of our business. He introduced us to customers, financed a move to larger quarters, provided a letter of credit for a performance bond that was very important, and set up an efficient account reconciliation plan for us."

"He knows intimately the problems of small businesses and minority businesses."

Mr. Brooks added, "Don is a banker with a broad-based business knowledge. And by learning our business, he's allowed us to grow. He knows intimately the problems of small businesses and minority businesses. And he understands that the problems are essentially the same: the inability to attract capital at a reasonable rate of interest; the difficulty of finding and keeping competent management; and the cost squeeze caused by competition with larger businesses. And Don's perceptive. We don't make a move without calling him."

Our banker is your bank.

Chemical Bank has people who can give you the same kind of help that Don Sharp is giving Dale R. Michael and Jim Brooks. Our banker can provide a large number of banking services. Fast. Without red tape and wasted time. So you have more time to take care of the business end of your business while our banker takes care of the banking end.

Try us. Call Chemical and we'll send a bank out to see you.

Why Did HEIM Advise Buyin Stocks in Oct

Why does he feel the recent "break" will continue, and which stocks does he suggest buying now?
In his Dec. 20, 1974 Forecast For 1975 Issue, LARRY HEIM said he felt a BIG RECOVERY might be coming, but advised investors not to make long-term commitments yet. In January 1975, he stated that he felt the DJIA could have a low of 820 and a high of around 840 during 1975.

From late 1970 into early June 1973, LARRY HEIM had been advising the use of gold shares as a hedge against the uncertainty of the stock market. Inflation, the economy and business in general. But in early June, HEIM made a dramatic reversal and advised his readers to sell all gold shares and take up a 50% cash position—and wait for the market to provide an opportunistic "Entry Point" during the correction.

Bullish at the Bottom Again
His Oct. 10, 1975 Issue announced the arrival of the "Entry Point" that HEIM looked for, and that the time to go selected common stocks had arrived. HEIM was at that time to pinpoint and announce another Head and Shoulder Bottom had announced a Double Bottom in December 1974. In his Oct. 10, 1975 Issue, HEIM showed the trend and shoulders on the chart below. "One of the most important factors that entered into a recommendation the purchase of stocks at this time is the mass shoulders bottom that has formed on the long-term chart for it chart pattern is extremely bullish for the future of stock prices have been watching this pattern take shape for quite some time it is now nearly complete."

Which "Second Tier" Stock Should You Consider Buying?
The Dec. 26, 1975 Forecast For 1976 edition, released before the recent explosive breakout, suggested that in 1976, the DJIA could be around 830 and the high near 1130. HEIM that the major down-handling has once again been decided that a new bull move had begun with much higher prices for participation. (The accuracy of previous advice does not assure the probability of future recommendations.)

SPOTLIGHT

M.C. Heir Apparent:
Gerald Meyers

By WILLIAM K. STEVENS

PROFIT—Some people think that mentality—broader in outlook, sensitive to social realities outside the executive suite—is taking shape at the top of the automobile industry. It is so, probably no one displays it more clearly than Gerald C. Meyers, vice president of the American Motors Corporation who at age 47 is in line of succession to company presidency. He is a man of a somewhat chiseled features, casual appeal and impressive intellectual unsharpened ambition and some intimidating managerial toughness. He failed the first grade in school in his home town, Buffalo, N.Y., but by far the most important since.

an arresting personal profile: 6'10" tall and 180 pounds, he is lighter than when he was in high school; born of a coloratura soprano who sang at the Metropolitan Opera (immigrant clothing manufacturer), off-the-job homebody he easily, including at himself, runs three to five miles each day, cuts down trees, rails for fun, takes his children, reads hungrily and is addicted to classical music. And he says "I thought the sun rose and John F. Kennedy and still such about the late President. Detroit expect Mr. Meyers A.M.C. president when Willem Luberg, the current president, retires. This would make the youngest top executive (or president) in the auto industry. His rise to the top would be an accession to power of the younger generation to reach after World War II. Among his Mr. Meyers has an any well-developed social philosophy by his identification with Kennedy. "Some people say it was bunk," long ago during a conversation at A.M.C. headquarters. He felt he represented a new United States."

ing exchanged his workday shirt and gray herringbone vest for a turtleneck and sitting amid the golds and whites of his warmly home in a wooded ravine in Bloomfield Hills, he expands.

thized with the Kennedy things," he said. "Twenty now, it will probably be so good." ed that the tales of high the Vietnam war he read Bernstein's book, "The Best of Times" were "a real education." He says he continues to identify Kennedy's capacity himself too seriously, as to try unconventional and his appeal to emerging values. "I don't think much of a surprise says he wasn't re-nany auto men were, by intervention in their business safety and emissions. he thought Ralph Nader role,"—a zealot but one quickly disappear. But Mr. sees not to have had "the ing that everything the loes is wrong, and there-g the Government does

He says "n't changed because Call-Resources Board charged o that A.M.C.'s cars failed state's pollution tests, and data was falsified (denied he board fined the auto-million. Vietnam war, the ecology movement, the sexual revolution.

"By the time we got through the end of the sixties, I became convinced that, really, we were a different country in some great measure and suddenly I began to pay attention to that."

Out of the turmoil of the sixties, he believes, came "a whole new group of people," cutting across age, sex, class and geographic boundaries, shaped by the events of the decade, exhibiting a "whole different set of values" that caused, or at least contributed to, an abrupt change in attitudes toward cars.

"The bulk of the new-value people have cast off the old ideas of what a car ought to be," he explains. "Instead of wrapping around themselves enough metal and enough girth to make a statement that 'I have arrived,' they're thinking about what a car is for: It ought to take me someplace, it ought to do it without trouble, it ought to have enough room, it ought to enable me to stay out of accidents as much as possible, and if I get into one, I'm going to be protected."

This perception has guided A.M.C. in its marketing strategy: Find a spot in the market not served by General Motors, Ford and the Chrysler Corporation, exploit it with a distinctive design, then move to another soft spot before the big boys catch up.

This game of bob-and-weave, which tiny American Motors sees as essential to its survival, produced the Rambler, the first American compact, and the Gremlin, the first American subcompact, and produced one of the most innovative designs of 1975, the futuristic Pacer, whose sales have had much to do with A.M.C.'s post-recession return to profitability.

None of this means American Motors has solved its problems. For instance, despite its devotion to smaller cars, the company never developed a light-weight, high mileage engine. Its small cars such as the Pacer, are really short, heavy cars rather than minicars in the European fashion. To help with this problem the company has bought the rights to produce a German engine. And though A.M.C. had a profitable June quarter, for its fiscal year ended Sept. 30 there was a $27.5 million loss, its first loss year since fiscal 1970.

Mr. Meyers acknowledges that profit, not social welfare, is the game in the automobile business. Although he is not exactly sure he likes the description, he volunteers that he is essentially "a buck-chaser."

He is also an unashamedly ambitious man who admits that he may be "less than modest" when asked to tell about himself.

"I'll give you the canned answer," he said when asked about his prospect of becoming company president. "It isn't up to me, it's up to the board of directors." But he also says, "I never had any ambitions in any organization except to be at the top," and adds, "I'm going to get there, if I have anything to do with it." As a sign of his rise, he has just been named as a management candidate to the A.M.C. board of directors.

If he does reach the top it will be the latest in a long, almost unbroken string of personal successes that began in school after his mother tutored away his first grade reading difficulties; winner of the Buffalo all-city scholarship prize in the 7th and 8th grades; all A's in high school; captain of the football team; a repeat of the pattern at Carnegie Tech in Pittsburgh, where in one year, 1950, he earned both a bachelor's and a master's degree. He broke into the auto business with Ford, moved to Chrysler and in 1962 to A.M.C. Two months ago he was named executive vice president, in effect an understudy to Mr. Luberg, the president, and overseeing development, manufacturing and marketing of all A.M.C. vehicles. At the same time, R. William McNeely Jr. was named vice chairman, putting him in line to succeed Roy D. Chapin Jr. as chairman when he retires in 1980.

"His problem is that he's too smart," said a friend, explaining that Mr. Meyers expects all his subordinates to be as sharp and energetic as he is. He is said to be impatient with, and sometimes unpleasant to, those he thinks are lagging in performance. "Brutal" is not an exaggerated description of his treatment of colleagues in some instances, according to one associate who generally admires him.

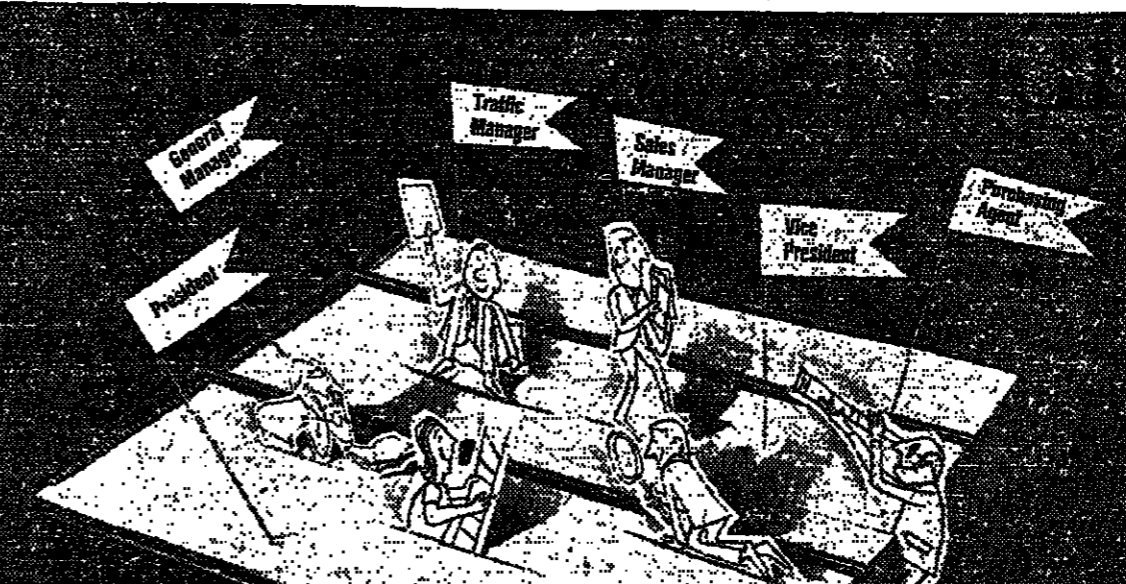

He says he tries to be "better informed than anyone else in the room" and deliberately challenges his subordinates to keep up. "I think it's an okay way to do business," he says. "Business is not a club, I don't consider it a fraternity."

He lives a quiet, low-key life with his wife Barbara, who he calls "liberated," and three children.

"We never talk about cars, never," says Mrs. Meyers, an open, genial woman. "Ideas and theories, yes," she continues. "He'll bring those home. But people have different selves in business. He's not tough at home."

Gerry Meyers' biggest challenges as a businessman probably still lie ahead. Some observers think that the "new value" theory may be wearing a little thin, that the world may already be moving beyond it. General Motors has brought out a minicar, its Chevrolet, and Ford is readying one. And A.M.C., long known as a maker of small cars, can no longer stake out that market as its own. Where the company will move next is a big question.

To Mr. Meyers, the effort to answer it is exhilarating. "That's quite a game," he says. "That's fun. I truly enjoy it."

 end I didn't because I think the place is incompatible with my personality. It's a first-rate operation, but too regimented."

Merrill Lynch, of course, argues that any business as big and as vulnerable to regulatory action as it can't be run without lots of rules.
 By its own lights Merrill is doing very well—but not well enough. Asked if there are some product areas in which he can accept low profitability, Mr. Regan softly taps his desk and succinctly says, "No."

In still another move to improve its profitability, Merrill—with the help of the Securities and Exchange Commission—recently cracked a monopoly on odd-lot trading that has stood for years. This move, too, was made over the objections of the Big Board. In the end, it may produce as much as $40 million a year in additional revenues for the firm and some commission savings for small investors.

The marketing appeal to the small investor is very much part of the Merrill tradition. The firm has directed

...much of its sales effort at the odd-lotter and made a lot of money in the process.
 It costs these days than five years ago, say, while institutional investors have beneficially from the move to negotiated rates.

Merrill has attempted to take some of the sting out of the increase with its "Share-builder" program that offers discounts of 20 percent or more. Other by retail firms have similar programs. Merrill also says that individual stockholders can negotiate rates in the same way as the institutions. Big individual clients, a spokesman maintains, can bargain for lower rates with almost the same clout as an insurance company.

Merrill's earnings were squeezed somewhat in the third quarter of last year by the revolution in commission rates it helped bring about. Those same rates in the past several months have forced a number of smaller firms that never diversified to either merge or close.

The attrition comes as no surprise to Mr. Regan.
 Moreover, he thinks the

...shakeout is only beginning.
 "It's the whole history of capitalism," he says. "There were numerous firms in automobiles and electronics, and then the number gradually settled down."

Mr. Regan has no doubts
 prosperity, but he thinks there will be a fair number of other well-managed firms in the field to keep it on its toes. "Competition," he insists, "is a healthy thing."

Presenting HOLT'S Specific Guidelines: OPTION SPREADS

How to take advantage of an UP or DOWN market

A special option-trading approach called "spreading"—simultaneously buying and writing options on the same underlying stock—enables traders to go after sizable profits in call options in a rising or falling market.

Spreading can reduce the risk inherent in options, without cutting the potentials too much, and requires a smaller capital outlay than straight option buying—adding another dimension to the leverage.

HOW IT WORKS
 In the simplest spread (which we recommend) you buy an option on a stock at one striking price and, at the same time, write an option on the same stock at a different striking price. Both have the same expiration date.

Normally, writing (or shorting) an option on a stock you don't own ties up a lot of money and involves unlimited risk. But in a spread, your maximum risk is explicitly known.

A spread can be tailored to a rising or a declining stock. In the current market, we think the more appropriate is the bearish spread—meaning the option you write is your primary bet, and the option you buy is your hedge.

BOOSTING THE ODDS
 You can increase the odds in your favor by following Holt's number one "rule" for successful spreading:

At the time you establish a spread, the option you write for short should be overpriced and the option you buy should be underpriced.

How do you tell? For every option on the CBOE and AMEX, THE HOLT OPTION SELECTOR regularly presents a Projected Option Value (POV) curve—plotting our estimate of the option's normal market value in relation to the price of its underlying stock. If the option is currently priced above its curve, we consider it overvalued, if below, undervalued.

With regularly updated POV curves in front of you—together with Holt's latest price/volume/moving average charts for each of the underlying stocks—you can readily spot new opportunities for spreads as they develop.

SPECIFIC GUIDELINES
 Holt's new Special Study on Option Spreads clearly shows how bearish and bullish spreads work and sets forth specific trading guidelines:

- Which particular options you should use if you expect the underlying stock to go down.
- Which particular options you should use if you expect the underlying stock to go up.
- How the option striking prices should relate to the current price of the underlying stock.
- How to figure in advance the maximum potential profit and maximum potential loss from a spread you're considering.
- Why you should establish a spread only if the profit/loss ratio is 2 to 1 or better in your favor.

INVESTMENT and GUARANTEE
 If option trading is appropriate for you—with your eyes wide open to the risks as well as rewards—we invite you to try THE HOLT OPTION SELECTOR, with a 30-day money-back guarantee, and see for yourself how much it can help you pinpoint the best opportunities right now. (Complete CBOE coverage is presented one week, complete AMEX the next, in regular rotation.)

Shiskin on the Unemployment Numbers

Seven Rates Proposed to Broaden the Perspective

By JULIUS SHISKIN

The recession has heightened public awareness of the fact that, while there has been agreement on the need for full employment, there has been little agreement on just what full employment is, how unemployment should be defined, or on what specific data should be used to make judgments on the performance of the economy.

There is even disagreement on whether the primary focus should be on the employment or unemployment statistics. The media—as well as the professional literature—has focused mostly on unemployment, and unemployment is the subject of this discussion.

Unemployment figures are used for different purposes. Some use the figures as a measure of the performance of the economy in relieving the economic and psychological hardship experienced by jobseekers, and judgments as to what constitutes hardship vary greatly. Some view economic hardship in terms of food, clothing and shelter. Others see it in terms of relative standing in the income distribution.

Still others consider an unemployed person who has adequate income from other sources to be experiencing psychological hardship. Further, many believe long spells of unemployment for teenagers to be especially damaging to their development as responsible citizens. Thus, no single way of measuring unemployment can satisfy all analytical or ideological interests.

I have assembled, however, a grouping of unemployment indicators, identified by the symbols U-1 through U-7, which illustrates a range of value judgments, from a very narrow to a very broad view. (An array of unemployment indicators similar to the M-1 to M-7 series used by the Federal Reserve to describe successively more comprehensive definitions of the money supply was suggested to me by Otto Eckstein of the Hawaiian Telephone Company in Honolulu.)

This array of a small group of unemployment measures is intended to make the point that the unemployment rates considered tolerable by different sections of society reflect different points of view about the severity of the hardship which is caused by unemployment. Others could, of course, make their own selection of such indicators. The data compiled by the BLS make it possible to construct a very large number of different measures of unemployment.

These seven measurements were chosen because they are representative of differing bodies of opinion about the meaning and measurement of unemployment. They are also meaningful and useful measures in their own right, and they can generally be ranked on a scale. The first five are regularly published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics; U-6 and U-7 can be calculated from components.

U-1. The number of persons unemployed 15 weeks or longer, as a percentage of the civilian labor force. The rationale behind the selection of this series is the belief that unemployment is a more severe problem when it has lasted long enough to cause financial hardship. The assumption is that shorter periods can be handled by unemployment compensation plus the use of savings and, in some cases, assistance from other family members.

U-2. The number of persons unemployed because they lost their last jobs, also taken as a percentage of the civilian labor force. The implication of this series is that unemployment is more serious for workers for whom the loss of a job leads to lower income. Unemployment that accompanies entry or re-entry into the labor force and voluntary job-leaving would appear to be considered an inevitable, but less serious, matter.

U-3. The number of household heads unemployed, as a percentage of all household heads in the civilian labor force. In this case it is assumed that unemployment is more serious when it affects breadwinners. Other jobseekers, secondary workers, would presumably be supported by the heads of households while they were seeking employment.

U-4. The number of unemployed persons seeking full-time jobs, as a percentage of all those in the full-time labor force. The assumption here is that a measure that depicts the employment situation for those strongly attached to the labor force is more meaningful than one which also includes more casual and marginally-attached workers. Unemployment is likely to be more serious for full-time than for part-time workers because the former are more likely to be breadwinners, will lose more income through inability to find work and are more committed to the labor force.

U-5. This is the official, regularly published total unemployment rate for all workers age 16 years and over. It presents the percentage of persons in the civilian work force not working but available for and seeking work. It can be viewed as the base series from which each of the other six series is constructed through the addition or subtraction of various labor force and unemployment components. In a sense, this series reflects a consensus among the many different groups of data users. It involves no value judgments regarding a person's family or marital status relative need for work or personal characteristics. It only requires that jobseeking take place. It has had widespread support from various study groups and was recommended by the Committee to Appraise Employment and Unemployment Statistics established by President Kennedy in 1961.

U-6. This measurement is constructed by adding to the number of unemployed persons seeking full-time work one-half the number of unemployed persons seeking part-time work and one-half of the number of persons

Eckstein on the Employment Numbers

Emphasis on Percentage Working Is Mislaced

By OTTO ECKSTEIN

The employment ratio has been proposed as an alternative measure to the national unemployment rate.

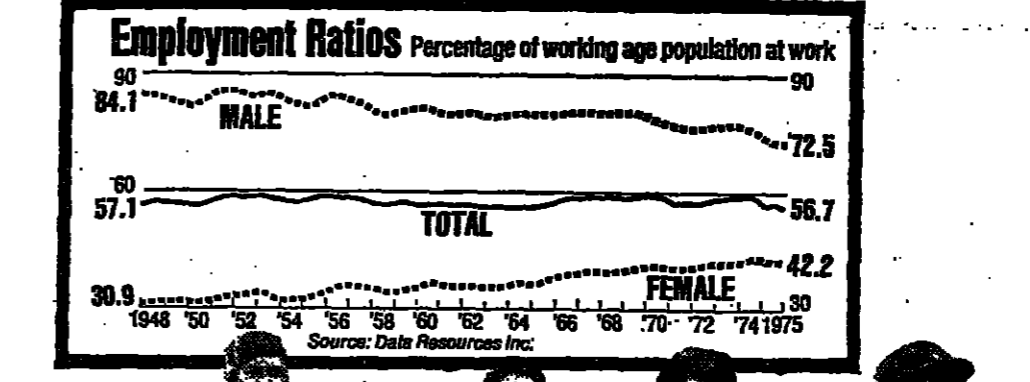

This ratio, which shows the percentage of the working-age population which is actually employed, has deteriorated in the current recession. But where the unemployment rate shows 1973-75 to be the worst experience since World War II, the employment ratio looks better than in the recessions of the 1930's and 1950's. If we were to redefine our national targets in terms of the employment ratio, it would have a profound impact on future policies and on future economic performance.

The change is only about two points, from 57 percent to 59 percent of the working-age population, but this rise hides massive changes within it. The employment ratio for men fell considerably, with the decline concentrated in the older age brackets.

Repeated easing of the retirement rules under Social Security has reduced the number of older workers. Labor contracts have emphasized more generous and earlier retirement provisions. Pension funds make it possible for increasing millions to live in dignity after ending their work careers.

In contrast, the employment ratio for women has risen very sharply since the early 1960's, outweighing the impact of the declining work habits of men.

All adult age groups for women, with the exception of those aged 65 and over, show rising employment ratios. Later marriages, fewer children, better job opportunities, and changed self-perceptions and life goals have raised the percentage of adult women with jobs from 35.2 percent in 1960 to 42.6 percent at the 1974 peak. This represents an extra 6.3 million people willing and able to work.

But, after studying this measure in detail, we have concluded that while employment ratios are worth watching because they have some measurement advantages compared to the unemployment rate and they do contain some additional information about inflationary pressures, employment ratios do not contradict our perception that the 1974-75 recession was the worst of the postwar period.

Starting from a relatively high base, the decline of the employment ratio in this recession was severe, from 58.2 percent at the end of 1973 to 55.9 percent in the spring of 1975. With total employment falling by 2.3 million between the third quarter of 1974 and the first quarter of 1975, and with the civilian working-age population expanding by 1.3 million over the same period, the new-found employment measure offers little cause for cheer.

For women aged 20 to 34, the employment ratio actually increased, as the sociological forces propelling women into the job market were still strong. For this group, the response of employment to recession really was different than in the past. It was the sharp decline in the employment of men and of teenagers of both sexes that produced the over-all decline. The recession did not blunt the drive for equal opportunity for women or their desire for employment.

It has also been argued that the employment ratio is a better measure of inflationary pressure in the labor market than the unemployment rate. In some periods, more individuals can be drawn into the labor force by higher wages and ample job opportunities, causing increased unit labor costs and inflation. We performed econometric tests to see if the historical wage record can be better explained with the employment ratio. We substituted various measures of the employment rate in wage equations. These studies show, however, that employment ratios are no better and no worse than the national unemployment in explaining changes.

The Lone Ranger, no, but the great American West is headed east, to the Sudan. A million-acre commercial cattle ranching operation requiring a $95 million investment supplied in part by the Sudanese government is planned, complete with feed lot, slaughter house and cannery.

The project is a joint effort of Saudi Arabia's Triad group—Triad is controlled by the Khoshoggi family—and the Arizona-Colorado Land and Cattle Company of Phoenix, which is selling advice and expertise. Thomas Wandstrand, vice president of AZLI International, the Triad-owned company which holds the project contract, says part of the plan is to hire ex-patriate ranchers, Australian and American cowboys, to teach the Sudanese modern methods of ranching technology.

"The nomads are used to using the whole country. But part of our program is to develop 20-acre coop ranching lots where 250 families produce cattle for slaughter," he said.

Made in Japan

When the Treasury ruled recently that Japanese electronic goods were not being subsidized for export to the United States, the department noted that "an unusual arrangement" exists between Japanese banks, industries and the Japanese government.

Questioned more closely, the Treasury admitted that parts of the "unusual arrangement" were, indeed, forms of subsidy. But the department also said the effect is "de minimis" or insignificant and thus not subject to penalties.

Among the unusual arrangements: The Japanese Development Bank gives lower interest rates to exporters, JETRO, or the Japanese External Trade Organization, a government organization with some connection with the banks, offers a whole range of assistance to exporters, and the "reserve," a provision of the 1973 Japanese tax laws which allows smaller firms to take accelerated depreciation on various export-related expenses.

Of course, any blow against the $1.7 billion in electronic goods would have had serious political ramifications.

THE ECONOMIC SCENE

A Year Makes a Big Difference

By THOMAS E. MULLANEY

AS Superbowl weekend arrives again to distract a large part of the nation's attention from the more meaningful issues of the day to the de- noucement of the football season, one is struck by the basic strengths of the economy—the assets that permit such easy diversion.

There is also the inclination to reflect on the lyrics of an old song, "What a Difference a Day Makes," and change the time element in it from a day to a year.

Looking back to mid-January of 1975, there is a great measure of satisfaction in contemplating the list of contrasts between economic conditions then and now. The nation is currently in the midst of a new upward business cycle that seems destined to carry farther along. Twelve months ago, the economy was declining steadily and deeply.

At that time the domestic economic picture was quite dark and stormy, with production and employment receding and the rate of inflation showing no signs of imminent abatement. The Chrysler Corporation, suffering from swollen inventories, was launching its historic rebate plan during its commercial spots on the Superbowl telecast to move its mountain of unsold cars. Other businesses were also afflicted by inventory headaches. And there were big questions about tax cuts and a new energy policy.

In the interim, a big tax cut ($23 billion) was enacted for 1975 and recently extended almost in its entirety for this year; a compromise controversial energy bill was adopted; the big inventory-liquidation wave has ended; inflation has turned downward; more than 300,000 jobs have been created; production and personal income have risen sharply; consumers are spending liberally again, and public confidence is displaying new enthusiasm.

The recession that began in November of 1973 was ended finally in May of 1975, and a new business expansion has been underway since then, with no signs of faltering for some time ahead. In the words of the song, "There's a rainbow before me . . . skies above can't be stormy."

The recent phenomenal activity and price improvement in the financial markets perhaps bespeak the changed atmosphere better than anything else—for good and solid reasons.

Yet one must wonder whether all the new euphoria is reaching excessive levels, with steel and other businesses lagging, the banks troubled by loan losses, Congress and the Administration battling over spending programs, local taxes rising, and inflation far from dead.

In the span of a single year, the over-all situation has indeed changed vastly, but is the nation looking merely at the surface calm and ignoring the still troublesome currents underneath? There are so many complex problems that remain unresolved in the economic and political areas, as well as the ever-present danger of resurgent high-level inflation.

Nevertheless, for the second week in a row, the spectacular performance of the more confident stock and bond markets has dominated the attention of the financial and business world and created a more optimistic outlook. Buyer interest was broad—institutions, foreigners and the general public.

After rising more than 50 points in the first full week of the new year in the second heaviest weekly trading in the market's history, the Dow Jones stock average registered a more moderate increase last week, but trading continued at a hectic, new-record pace.

The market average, which started last year at 616, is now up to the 930 area and seemingly headed back to the 1,000 level that was last seen early in 1973. A few weeks ago, many security analysts were expecting the attainment of that milestone sometime during the current year. Now, some of them are changing the timetable to the current quarter.

Interestingly, it was 11 years ago this month that the Dow indicator first crossed the 900 barrier. It has obviously done a considerable amount of backing and filling ever since without much real progress. The record high, at 1051.70, was attained on Jan. 11, 1973.

The bond market has been moving in tandem with the stock market in recent weeks with a similarly explosive rise—and for the same reasons: easier monetary conditions and lessened inflationary pressures. But last week the bond market showed signs of exhaustion, making analysts wonder if the stock market will soon follow.

Last Wednesday, exactly five weeks after the latest credit market rally started, bond prices declined. Profit-taking, a normal consequence of any protracted move in the securities markets, played a large part in the turnaround.

In addition, investors began to balk at accepting the lower yields that Wall Street was offering. Two-year Treasury notes, for example, were priced on Wednesday to yield 6.50 per cent—well below their 8.44 per cent high last fall. On the same day, high-grade 30-year utility bonds were priced to yield 8.50 percent, a major drop from the 9.70 percent level prevailing early last December.

However, after the price declines on Wednesday and early the following day, the credit markets quickly recovered a bit and then settled back to await some further signs of the Federal Reserve's monetary intentions. Then, on Friday, the prime rate was lowered to 6 3/4 percent by the First National City Bank of New York and the Fed cut the discount rate to 5 1/4 percent from 6 percent—two favorable omens for the markets.

Will the stock and bond markets now resume their recent vigor, or have they shot their bolt for the present? If the money supply and the economy begin to grow faster, rates may climb again. If they don't, of course, rates will likely continue on their recent downward path, with prices rising.

As expected, the economy's rise slowed considerably in the fourth quarter of last year from the abnormally fast pace of the third quarter. But the gain was still impressive, with real growth increasing by more than 6 percent during the final three months of 1975.

There seems to be enough underlying strength in the economy to assure continued expansion for many months ahead. And the history of previous expansion periods for the domestic economy in the past 120 years shows the average length to have been 33 months. The current one is now only nine months old.

It is true, of course, that the current business upturn is spotty, but that is quite normal. The big thrust is now coming principally from revived consumer spending and auto sales. But housing and business-capital spending are expected to increase in the months ahead to help the recovery along.

Although over-all construction activity has been lagging, the housing market has been steadily regaining ground for several months and should continue to do so. While business spending for new plants and equipment is expected to increase by only 5.5 percent this year, according to a Government survey last week, the figure according to a Government survey last week, the businessmen see continued evidence of a stronger consumer economy, improved profits, further strength in their own corporate liquidity and declining interest rates.

However, there are enough clouds in the picture to warrant concern and caution. Programs must be found to reduce the high level of unemployment—a situation bound to remain serious with so many states and cities cutting back on their spending, reducing services and furloughing employees. The need for more industrial jobs—and the incentives to create them—is obvious.

There is also the danger of resurgent inflation as the economy becomes stronger or Washington adopts needless stimulative policies in this Presidential election year. There is the further prospect of strongly militant moves for large wage increases by labor in a critical year of bargaining in several key industries, covering some 4.5 million workers.

The need for greater political and economic stability in the rest of the world is another crucial element in the prospects for the American economy.

For the moment, at least, the financial markets seem to be accenting the positive factors in the outlook and discounting the negative ones. They have been fairly reliable as leading indicators, though not infallible. Have they been overreacting with their recent enthusiasm? Only time will tell, of course, but the fundamentals in the economic picture seem to justify a measure of market bullishness at this point. What a difference a year makes.

MARKETS IN REVIEW

Dow Climbs 18.50 On Record Volume

The stock market last week posted a net gain of 18.50 points, and along the way set all kinds of records, including the most volume for any week's trading—158.6 million shares compared with the previous high of 145.68 million shares traded in the week ended Jan. 31, 1975.

The Dow Jones industrial average closed at 929.63 on Friday which, with the 52.42 point gain of the preceding week meant a net gain of 70.92 points in the first two weeks of 1976.

Thursday's volume of 38.45 million shares was the highest for any single trading day in New York Stock Exchange history and on that same day records were also set on first-hour volume—10.95 million shares—the tape fell behind 30 minutes. That lag, coupled with a delay of 28 minutes on Wednesday, indicated the return of small investors to the market.

With the tape running so far behind, it was hard for such small investors to know the price of the stocks they were trading, but it didn't deter them from staying in the market. The flood of small orders was traced in part to several reports released by the Commerce Department on gross national product, inventories and retail sales.

But the price rump waned on Thursday when the White House reported that President Ford would propose in his budget message tomorrow that the Federal Government give to states control of $10 billion in health programs. Prior to that point, shortly after 11 A.M., the Dow Jones index was up more than 5 points. By 1:30 P.M. it was unchanged and at the close it was down 5.12.

Ford Motor announced on Thursday that it had decided to rescind the major part of its 2.2 percent, or roughly $97 average increase, per car. Ford's stock fell 7/8 to 48 1/2. That same day Middle South Utilities hit a new low of 15 1/2, following the sales of two blocks totaling more than 9.9 million shares. GENE SMITH

Détente is Demanding

Clear Arms: Kissinger Finally Heading to Moscow

Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger is finally taking his trip to Moscow to discuss a nuclear arms agreement, the Middle East involvement of both the United States and the Soviet Union in the Angolan civil war. The fourth item on the agenda, however, most serious one: The two different views of the essence and parameters of their policy of détente.

Kissinger still insists that Soviet support of one of three factions in Angola has been patently a genuine relaxation of United States-Soviet tensions; on that account that he postponed his trip several times. At a conference last week, however, Kissinger's willingness to go now now on two grounds: first, the Soviets have promised to move the arms talks, and second, the importance of those negotiations in the dispute in Angola.

Ranking of issues appears to be something of a change in American view of détente. Though Mr. Kissinger formerly held that direct Soviet-United States relations were linked to all other areas, he now says the talks are too important for such to stall them.

The Russian view, détente does prohibit Soviet support for independence groups involved in wars of national liberation. To the Soviets, means Angola is outside the scope of détente, just as the United States was when the détente with Vietnam was signed in 1972.

Kissinger and Mr. Brezhnev are trying to agree on the all-inclusive, to implement the agreement reached on strategic limits in Vladivostok in 1974, to set limits on the number of long-range missile launchers and strategic bombers each nation may have.

Agreement on specific provisions has been complicated by Russian commitment of the so-called Backfire and American development of cruise missile, a sort of robot plane. Now, Washington sources in the United States are considering a proposal that toughens opposition to Russian deployment of the Backfires but softens limits on the cruise mis-

Angola coastal enclave of Cabinda which Zaire encircles.

As Mr. Kaunda said, however, it is the United States and Russia who now bear the greatest responsibility for the actions of their client factions and the result for Angola.

Russia: Officials in Moscow were reported to be disappointed that the Popular Movement, supported by a heavy flow of Soviet arms, was not recognized as Angola's government. The Russians will almost certainly continue to send arms, and to support the estimated 7,500 Cuban troops fighting with the Popular Movement. Prime Minister Fidel Castro has said he has no intention of withdrawing.

The United States: Washington officials took the failure of the Popular Movement to gain recognition as a diplomatic victory. But the two groups that Washington backs are militarily inferior to the Popular Movement, they are apparently losing the war and the question now seems to be whether the United States can quickly shore up its clients.

Such action would be important to South Africa as well. Its Government, supporting the same side, is under increasing domestic pressure to justify the expense and the human losses of intervening in Angola. So far, South Africa shows no signs of withdrawing.

The Ford Administration has limited room for action. Secretary of State Kissinger will discuss Angola with the Russians next week, but there seems little reason they should desist just when their side is advancing. The Senate last month voted to end all covert aid in Angola, and when Congress reconvenes this week, Mr. Ford is expected to try to get a reversal in the House, perhaps through some compromise plan. He is also expected to fail.

In that case, the only obvious way the Administration could continue supplying its two factions would be through about $19 million in aid to Zaire, which could then transship the arms to Angola. That kind of transfer is illegal under American law, but it has been done before.

Angola, the focus of all of this attention, is little known to much of the world. But the ethnic and tribal makeup of its six million people and the potential wealth of the country may help explain the civil war and the attention. In addition to Cabinda's oil, Angola has rich deposits of iron and the fifth largest diamond fields in the world.

The Angolan people consist of three main tribal groupings: The Kimbundu are dominant around Luanda and the Northwestern areas controlled by the Popular Movement. The Bakongo live along the Northeast border with Zaire and generally support the pro-Western Front for the National Liberation of Angola. The Bakongo's tribal boundaries cross the Zaire River into Zaire and that in part explains the closeness of the National Front with the Mobutu Government. In the south, the Ovimbundu provide the tribal support for the other American-backed group, the Union for the Total Independence of Angola.

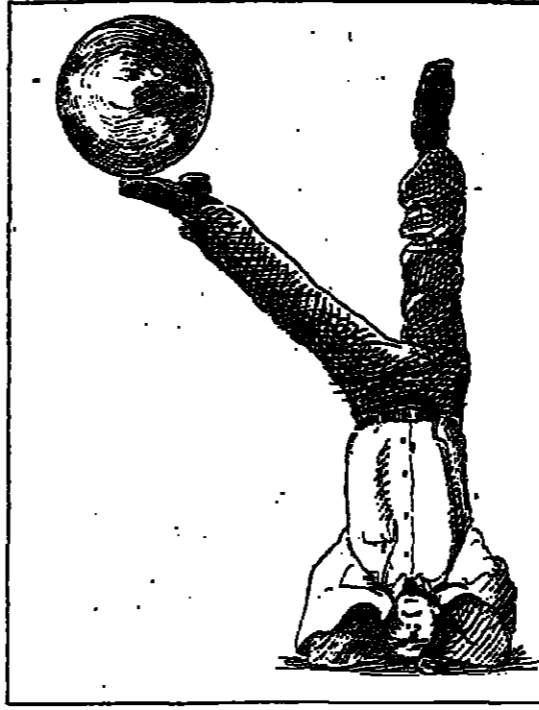

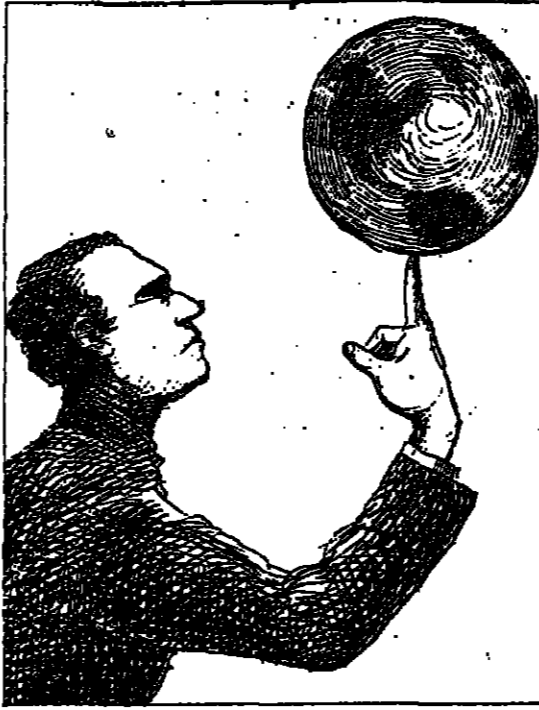

Mideast: A Veto By U.S. Is Likely

The debate on the Middle East in the Security Council of the United Nations has so far gone largely as expected. The United States alone, opposed seating a delegation from the Palestine Liberation Organization, which was then seated; China and the Soviet Union, while on the same side of the discussion, used the session to belabor each other, the Egyptians and the Syrians, also on the same side, nevertheless are reported in serious disagreement about the kind of Palestinian resolution to be introduced, and the Israelis are boycotting the session entirely.

It is the Egyptian-Syrian dispute that is most meaningful for the time being. The nature of the resolution to be voted on will determine whether the United States exercises its veto, as it has promised Israel it would do if that nation's negotiating position is threatened. The likely scenario is that the veto will be used, since even the relatively moderate Egyptian proposals are probably intended to isolate the United States rather than win its approval.

As the Security Council met, the civil war in Lebanon spread from Beirut's growing rubble to much of the country, and the fighting last week included Palestinian guerrillas as well as Lebanon's Christians and Moslems. At one point, Lebanese Air Force jets strafed Palestinians attacking a Lebanese army column. Thousands have died in the fighting, and repeated truces have been used only to resupply and reposition the combatants.

Politics In Foreign Policy Is the Norm

By LESLIE H. GELB

WASHINGTON—The expression, "politics stops at the water's edge" has always been more of a ploy than a description of reality. Campaigning Presidents have often tried to act as if the water were right outside of the White House; their opponents have sought to bridge the Presidential moat by invective and invention.

As the primaries approach, President Ford and those who aspire to his office are already seeking to use foreign policy issues for individual advantage. Under debate, are détente with the Soviet Union, the strategic arms limitation talks, the Middle East negotiations, and the role of the United States in the United Nations. Politicians do speak on these matters out of conviction and belief, but it is fair to assume that they calculate political advantage as well.

President Ford's handling of détente is a good example. By being tough with Moscow, he can help himself with Republican conservatives in the primaries; but this approach might well cost him later with the general public that seems to approve détente.

This is clearly the case of the nuclear arms negotiations with Moscow. Grain sales have presented another problem. Here, Mr. Ford has chosen to reject urgings from some conservative quarters to cut off grain sales to Russia in order to force the Soviets out of Angola and has chosen instead to sell, and win favor with the farmers.

Most Democratic candidates have found themselves in a similar quandary. Unlike former Gov. Ronald Reagan most of them genuinely desire son generally accommodated President Eisenhower on foreign policy. But it is difficult to think of an active candidate for President who showed similar restraint.

But sometimes politics has been deliberately used as a medium to advocate foreign policy changes. Henry Wallace even went so far as to form his own party in the Truman era with that aim in mind.

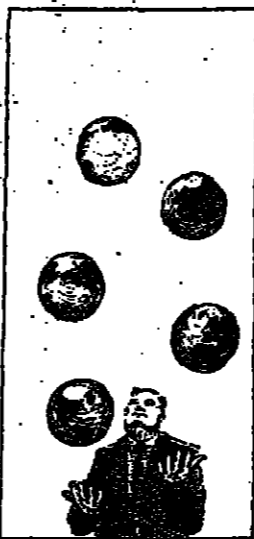

Incumbent Presidents, however, have demonstrated a willingness to run political risks for policies they thought were right. Mr. Truman did not break relations with Communist China after the Nationalist Chinese were defeated. President Ford worked hard to prevent an aid cutoff to Turkey, despite what this cost him among Greek-Americans. Even now with respect to the Middle East, it can be said that Mr. Ford may be endangering his position with American Jews as he edges toward a more positive view of the rights of Palestinians, even if he is balancing these risks by pushing for a substantial aid package to Israel.

When Presidents call for bipartisan support at these times, their exhortations can be judged sincere. But in many instances, the call is also a technique for damning opponents. It is another way of saying the opponent is "playing politics with the nation's security."

For example, when Administration officials charge that Democratic Congressmen are seeking partisan advantage on the Angola issue, these officials know that most of these Congressmen sincerely believe that the Administration's policy in Angola is wrong.

There have been times, too, when Presidents have appeared cynical. For example, some of President Kennedy's closest aides have acknowledged that he told Senator Mike Mansfield in 1963 that he would get American troops out of Vietnam, but only after the 1964 election. The point was clear: Mr. Kennedy believed the war was wrong, but was not going to chance accusations of being soft on Communism.

Also, to say that Presidents and others play politics with foreign policy is not necessarily bad. President Franklin Roosevelt campaigned on keeping the United States out of war even as he moved closer to outright hostility with Nazi Germany. Those who opposed this accused him of being deceitful; supporters argued that he was merely calibrating public opinion and leading. Today, many Republicans and Democrats alike take strong exception to Administration policies—perhaps stronger than they actually believe—to get attention and foster a public debate on policy. Politics, in this sense, is part of the democratic process.

Always Fragile

Lebanon, An Artificial Nation, May Not Endure

By JAMES M. MARKHAM

BEIRUT—As machinegun fire crackled outside his office, a Beirut editor observed that the only things uniting the people of Lebanon these days are the water, electricity and telephone systems, which have miraculously functioned through nine months of butchery.

Even these feeble ties are now in peril. The question arises as to whether Lebanon, always a fragile entity, can survive. As of now, it has fallen apart. It is a congeries of city-states, village-states and even statelets consisting of a few city blocks, complete with warlords, private armies, tax collectors and local schools.

When they reach back into their history, thoughtful Lebanese compare today's terrible ordeal with the massacres of 1860 when Maronite Catholic peasants clashed with the Druzes in the mountains south of Beirut. More than 14,000 Christians were killed; 100,000 were left destitute and homeless.

The indifference of the ruling Turkish Pashas to the massacres prompted the intervention of the French on behalf of their fellow Christians. Then, after the Turks ended up on the losing side in World War I, the French and the British seized Lebanon, and the French went on to create a new state, adding chunks of Syria to the old Mount Lebanon.

A constitution drafted by Christian notables in 1926, in consultation with the French mandate authorities, gave the more advanced Christian communities an edge over their Moslem brethren that has persisted until today.

Since final independence from France became a reality in 1942—after a gentlemanly "freedom struggle" by Moslem and Christian aristocrats—Lebanon has maintained the forms of a constitutional democracy, but under tumultuous circumstances.

Lebanon's sharpest crises have erupted at the end of the six-year mandate of the President, by tradition from the Maronite community, which follows the Eastern Rite but owes allegiance to the Vatican. In 1953, the attempt by President Camille Chamoun to prolong his stay in office provoked civil war and, in the name of stemming "Soviet expansionism," the landing of United States Marines on the beaches of Beirut.

The 1958 conflict, which left perhaps 600 people dead, is folkloric by comparison with today's carnage, which has taken perhaps 6,000 lives.

The mandate of President Suleiman Franjeh expires on Sept. 23, and many Lebanese are convinced that the bloodletting will continue until his successor is chosen—if that is possible.

Theoretically, the 99-member Parliament, which finely reflects Lebanon's confessional kaleidoscope but favors the Christians, should be re-elected this spring and then in August select a new President. But Beirut and the countryside have been slashed into Christian, Moslem, Druze and Palestinian zones of influence, and no one expects elections to take place. All parties seem agreed that the sitting Parliament will have to vote to extend its own mandate and then choose a new President.

The Lebanese have been slaughtering each other at a rate that surpasses the political issues at stake—a greater share of power for the Moslems, guarantees for the Christian minority, a definition of the sprawling Palestinian presence and, most important now, the choice of the next President of Lebanon.

The only vaguely intact political machine that cuts across communal boundaries and which might form the base for a new regime is a legacy of the late President Fouad Chehab, a one-time army commander who tolerated Lebanon's bickering politicians but ran the country through the army and its intelligence arm the Deuxieme Bureau.

The Chehab Legacy

Prime Minister Rashid Karami, a Moslem aristocrat who has "governed" since July, is a Chehabist: so is Elias Sarkis, the Maronite head of the Central Bank who lost out to Mr. Franjeh in the 1970 Presidential contest by one vote. There are Chehabists in the army and the bureaucracy. Most important, Syria would probably support some sort of Chehab-style government.

If the Chehabists cannot put Lebanon back together again, it is hard to see who can. There is talk of a coup by the much-abused 18,000-man army, which so far has not split on religious lines. But a coup would have to have the sanction of Syria, the right-wing Phalangists and the Palestine Liberation Organization and finding an acceptable candidate to lead a coup would not be easy.

Syria, which has never forgotten its irredentist designs, has issued a stern warning to the Christian right-wingers that it will intervene in force if they seriously try to partition Lebanon—even if that meant war with Israel.

The fear is always present that Lebanon's civil war, though ferocious now, might escalate into a broader, much more serious Syria-Israeli conflict that would probably quickly involve the entire Middle East.

Those fears are not based solely on Syria's possible intervention. Phalangists have been concerned, for some time that guerrilla attacks on Israel by Palestinians based in Lebanon might spur the Israelis to attempt annexation of Southern Lebanon. Israeli jets routinely fly reconnaissance missions over Lebanon without challenge. For now, however, it appears that both Israel and Syria would much prefer to avoid such an escalation, although there is occasional sabre rattling from both sides.

Moreover, Lebanon is already partitioned, in fact if not in name, though the boundaries resemble a jigsaw puzzle in some places. Its discredited political establishment, overtaken by the violence, now seems helpless to do anything about it.

Angola: Africans Kill, So It's Up Big Powers

Organization of African Unity failed to agree on an "African solution" to the civil war in Angola. The consequences may be serious. Gambian President Kenneth Kaunda of Africa's most respected states, said: "Power is [now] in the hands of the superpowers, to whom we hand Africa by our failure."

Kaunda was among the 22 African leaders who opposed recognition of the Soviet-backed Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola, favored a negotiated settlement and immediate ceasefire. Another 22 states favored recognition. The result was frustration and inaction. There was a substantial increase in tempo of the war. The Popular Movement attacked and now controls of northern Angola and has led some troops of two American-backed factions into neighboring Zaire. President Mobutu Sese Seko of Zaire threatened to retaliate if the Popular Movement violates his borders. He does, his reasons may not be solely military: He has long sought access to take over the oil-rich

In Summary

Spain's Regime Shows It Will Control Reform

The level of conflict is rising in Spain between labor and political organizations of the left and the month-old Government of King Juan Carlos II that succeeded the Franco dictatorship.

While the situation is far from being out of control, the activity, extraordinary after years of docility, has provided the first glimpses of Spain's infant political system. The main questions for the future are in what form and direction that system will grow.

The first, inconclusive evidence is that the regime will be firm, allowing liberalization at its own pace and suppressing—as a last resort and with less harshness than under Franco—those it considers dangerous opponents.

The source of the conflict has been a controversial and unpopular wage freeze imposed by the Government two weeks ago. By last Monday 150,000 workers were on strike or had been locked out in a second week of anti-Government protests; work was at a standstill in many industrial districts; the nation's postal, telephone and public transportation services had been briefly but seriously interrupted. A surprisingly strong coalition of Communists and Socialists had taken control of the protests and threatened to broaden them.

The Government first warned against politicizing the unrest—strikes are now legal in Spain, but only for economic reasons, not political ones—then, after two days acted firmly but apparently without brutality to stop the protesters. About 120 leading members of the outlawed coalition were arrested, and several demonstrations were broken up by police using tear gas.

The Government also postponed for a year the election of a new Parliament because current election laws would have produced a rightist, unrepresentative body. It also issued a statement saying it would resist further pressures and retain its own timetable for reform. That timetable is scheduled to be announced Feb. 28.

There may be a reduction of pressure on the Government in the immediate future because negotiations have settled several major strikes for increased wages.

But the situation is still so amorphous that it is, sometimes difficult to gauge the depth of popular support for the outlawed Communists and Socialists.

U.S. Insists on Free Market for Commodities

The Ford Administration has apparently decided to end a brief experiment at participating in broad commodity agreements with developing countries that seek to stabilize and increase their export earnings. The Government said it will not sign a recently negotiated international agreement on cocoa prices. Washington is taking a generally negative view toward such arrangements.

The United States historically has opposed broad commodity agreements because it preferred a free market system. Last year, Secretary of State Henry Kissinger agreed to consider commodity agreements on a case-by-case basis. His modification of the American position was in response to the complaints of developing countries about low prices paid for their goods and their demands for a redistribution of the world's wealth.

Developments and negotiations involving cocoa, coffee, sugar, bauxite and copper made it clear the United States would lose economically by participating.

Guillermo Rodriguez Lara, deposed President of Ecuador, joins residents of his home town, Fujil, in a welcome home celebration.

There is a widely held view that the developing countries suffer under a free market system because they pay relatively high prices for manufactured goods while receiving fluctuating but frequently low prices for their exports. This idea has become a subject of dispute among experts. But commodity agreements do seek to maintain a floor under prices; there is none in a free market system of supply and demand.

Japan Chooses: China, Not Russia

Prime Minister Takeo Miki of Japan says that his nation is ready to sign a treaty with China to bring a formal end to World War II and to define their new relationship. His announcement is a major policy shift and apparently was triggered by Japanese anger after three days of unsuccessful talks between Japanese Foreign Minister Kiichi Miyazawa and Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko.

Japan has refused so far to sign the treaty with China largely because of Russia's objection to a provision committing Japan and China to oppose any third nation's attempt to achieve hegemony in Asia. The third nation is clearly the Soviet Union, and Japan has wanted to stay out of the Sino-Soviet conflict.

But the Japanese were dismayed by Mr. Gromyko's adamant refusal to concede anything on Japan's request for the return of four islands off Japan's northern coast seized by Russia at the end of World War II, and his complaints about the China treaty. They told Mr. Gromyko that Japan's relations with China were not his affair.

The progress toward the signing of the Sino-Japanese treaty leaves many unanswered questions about the future of their relationship, which has been expanding steadily since they established diplomatic relations in 1972.

Quiet Change in Thailand

Thailand's fragile coalition Government has collapsed, largely because Parliament had too many political parties representing widely divergent interest groups or regional factions.

The military dictatorship in Thailand was ousted after student-led uprisings in 1973. In the country's first elections last January, 40 parties sponsored candidates and 22 of those parties won representation in Parliament. Prime Minister Kukrit Pramoj's ruling coalition, which lasted 10 months, represented eight parties with widely different interests. Mr. Pramoj has lacked the support in Parliament to develop economic programs. New elections are set for April.

Even Quieter in Ecuador

Ecuador's President, Gen. Guillermo Rodriguez Lara, has been overthrown and a new military junta formed to take his place, but it was all done very gently.

Higher prices, caused in part by a fall in Ecuador's oil earnings, led to considerable labor and student agitation and eventually to the change of regime. The actual coup was postponed for a day so that General Rodriguez Lara's daughter could be married in the Presidential Palace. When the general returned to his home town after holding power for nearly four years (he survived a coup attempt last September), his townsmen welcomed him, and he joined them in an impromptu dance.

The Soviets, Chinese, and Americans All Are Suitors

Defenseless Japan Is Pursued By Everyone

By RICHARD HALLORAN

TOKYO—Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko of the Soviet Union has just left here after trying to persuade Japan to stay away from China. The Chinese for months have been asking the Japanese to agree to a peace and friendship treaty that defines their basic relationship. Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger, whose earlier diadain for the Japanese was once an open secret in Washington, now comes through here regularly to keep America's Japanese allies apprised of dealings with China and Russia.

In addition, Prime Minister Takeo Miki sat with President Ford and leaders of Britain, France, Germany and Italy at the Rambouillet conference in November, the first time a Japanese leader had been invited as an equal to such a gathering. This year, a string of national leaders are due to visit Japan: President Anwar el-Sadat of Egypt, King Hussein of Jordan, Prime Minister Pierre Elliot Trudeau of Canada, and possibly President Valery Giscard d'Estaing of France.

This courting of Japan goes on even though this nation wields little power in the traditional sense: The Japanese have less military force than many of their smaller neighbors. Japan is so dependent on imports of food, fuel, and raw materials that a naval blockade could strangle the nation in a few months.

The only real resource Japan has is people. It is the 110-million Japanese who give their nation international influence. The Japanese have built an industrial empire, developed financial and managerial skills, and acquired the modern technology to make their nation a major economic power. Other nations want the Japanese on their side, or, if that is not possible, to deny to their adversaries the benefits of Japan's economic power.

Mr. Gromyko worked hard to prevent Japan from improving relations with China. Underneath the diplomatic rhetoric, the Soviet Union would like to stop Japanese steel and machinery, Japanese money and management advice, and Japanese know-how from strengthening the economy, and therefore the military might, of China.

The American Connection

The Chinese want just what the Russians don't want them to have. They seem likely to get it, given the trade figures, the number of important Japanese who travel to China and the Chinese who come to Japan.

For the United States, Japan was once considered vital as a site for American military bases and a source of logistic support for American forces in Asia. That is no longer nearly so important as Japan's role as a supplier of imports, a market for exports, a partner in international finance, and the swing nation in the balance of power in Asia.

The United States doesn't want tension between Japan and the Soviet Union, but neither does it approve of Japan leaning too close to the Russians.

The gradual thickening of the ties between Japan and Russia may make China stronger and more effective for Mr. Kissinger's policy of playing Chinese and Russians off against one another.

The Japanese have adopted the tactics of martial art, judo, to international relations: never make the first move, but entice their opponent into lunging. Then they apply their leverage, momentum and turn him as best they can to their own advantage. As an American businessman long experience in Japan once said: "The Japanese are the world's best negotiators from a point of view."

The Japanese have been able to avoid many decisions by relying on the American umbrella and they have seemed increasingly of that reliance since the fall of Indochina as war scars in Korea last spring.

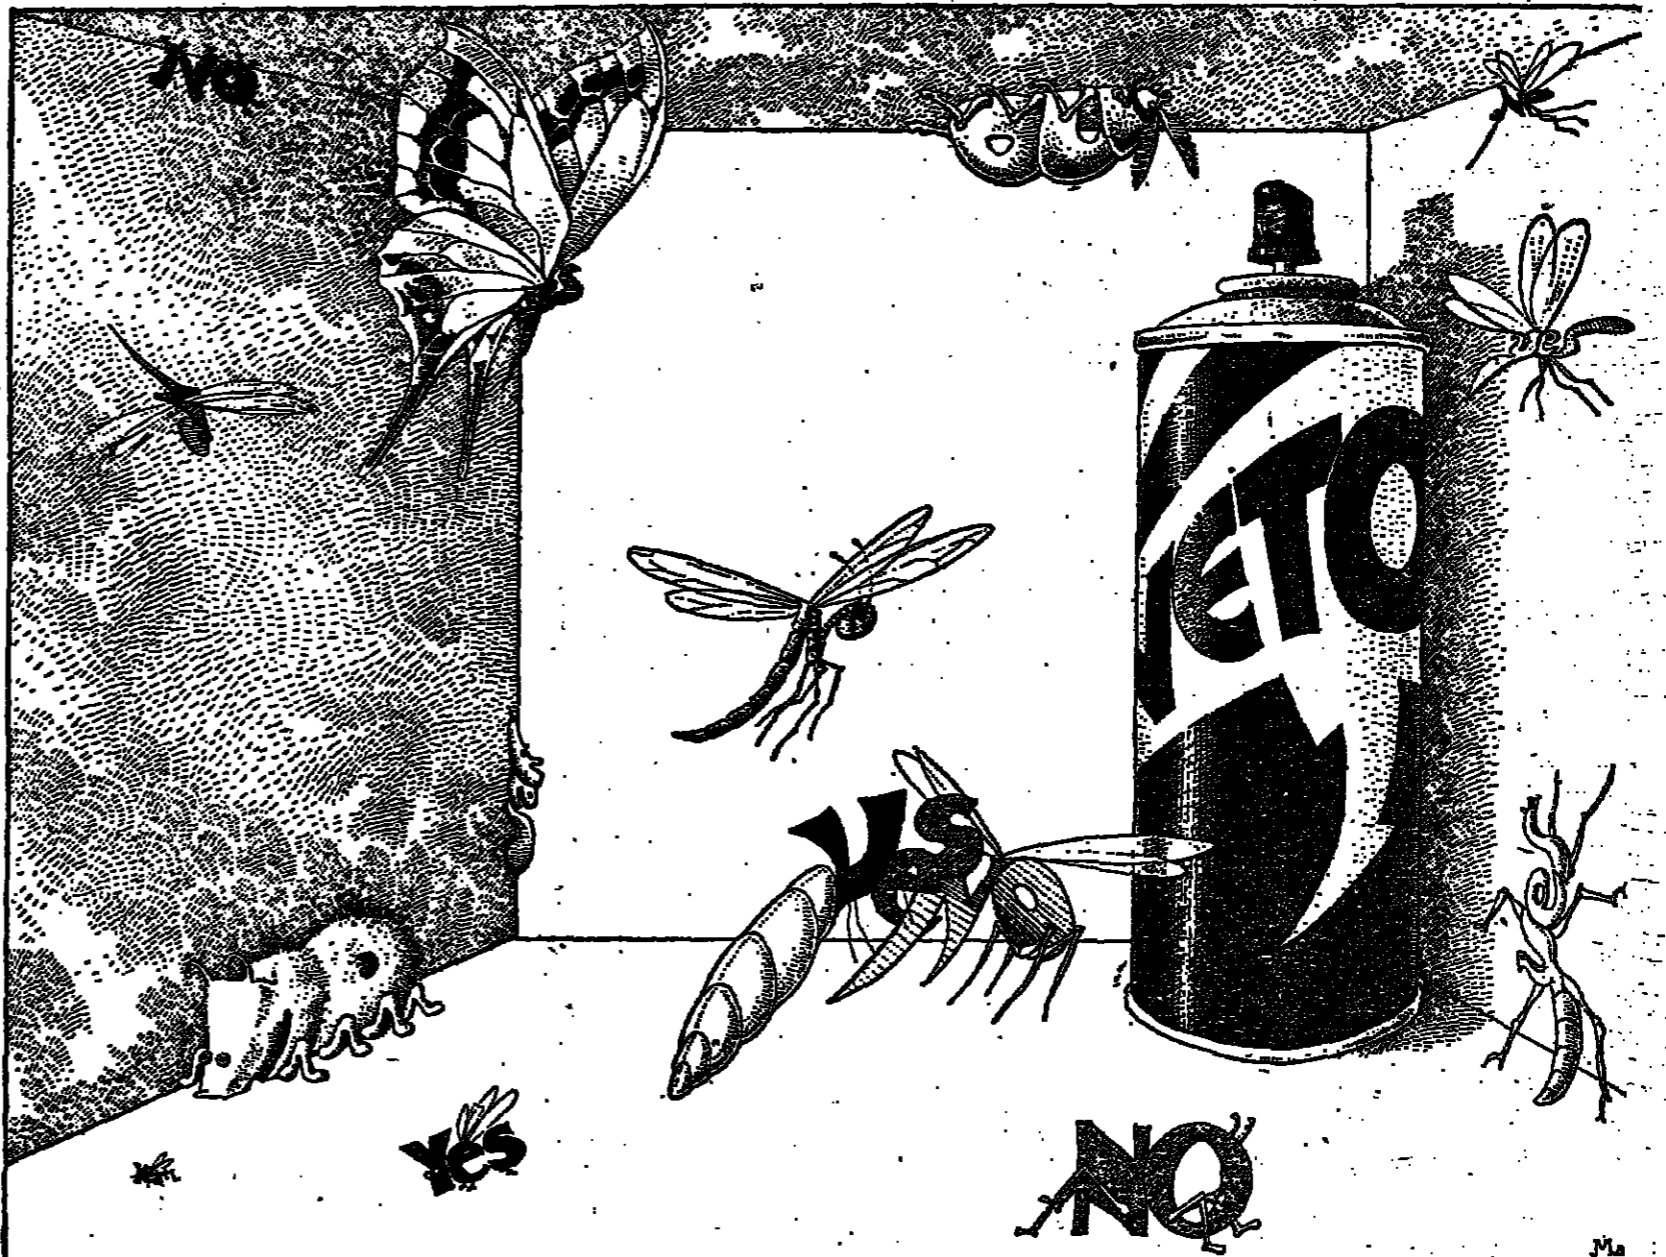

This doesn't mean that the day of military in Asia has passed, or that Japan will be the current strategy forever.

But for now, the Japanese are content. Mr. Gromyko told Mr. Miki that the Union might be forced to "reconsider" its relations with Japan if Tokyo adopted a pro-Chinese policy. Behind him stood his nation's nuclear potential, a mighty army, and a strong naval force just the sea of Japan in Vladivostok.

The Japanese just shrugged it off. "We take him too seriously," said a senior official. "He really didn't know what he was talking."

The Security Council Is Where the Action, and Inaction, Is

U.S. Learns the Politics of the Veto

By HARLAN CLEVELAND

The presence of representatives of the Palestine Liberation Organization in the United Nations Security Council has raised once again questions about the United States veto power. It is an important question because the United States is only now, belatedly, learning how to use its veto—and when not to use it.

The Security Council of the United Nations matters. Potentially and sometimes really, it has far more clout than most Americans realize. The United States is not dealing here with a General Assembly that makes recommendations to governments which they are then free to ignore. In the Security Council America's United Nations delegation is part of a 15-member committee on which 143 governments have by treaty conferred "primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security," and agreed that "in carrying out this responsibility the Security Council acts on their behalf."

In 1945, the five largest powers that had just won World War II rightly considered this an unprecedented session of sovereignty. So they put themselves on the Security Council as permanent members who had to vote Yes for any decision to be made.

The mythology of the time was that the veto had to be put into the United Nations Charter because the Russians insisted on it. But the other half of that half-truth was that the United States delegation at the 1945 San Francisco conference would have had to insist on the veto's inclusion if the Russians had not. Even in the euphoria of a hot war won and a cold war not yet declared, the United States Senate would have rejected a treaty which could commit the United States to war ("sanctions" against "aggression") without American permission.

Nevertheless the United States sense of security as the world's only superpower produced a lofty moral tone in American comment on the vetoes to which the Soviet Union unabashedly resorted.

Each time the Soviet Union withheld its "affirmative vote" from a resolution bearing Communist behavior, there would be a rash of complacent commentary from the American delegation preening itself on never having used so blunt an instrument in its diplomacy. Even Secretary of State Dean Acheson, normally a hard-headed curmudgeon on United Nations matters, sponsored a "Uniting for Peace" resolution designed to escape the Security Council veto by moving peacekeeping measures into the one-nation, one-vote General Assembly. Fortunately for his successors, that ploy was short-lived.

During the United Nations' first 25 years, the United States eschewed the veto because there was a gentler way to keep bad things from happening in the Security Council. When the Security Council had only eleven members, its decisions required a constitutional majority of seven. Thus, any five members could frustrate action by simply not voting at all. Three of the other four "permanent" members—were United States allies—Britain, France and Nationalist China—so only one of the six rotating members had to be recruited to "abstain to death," any proposal not to Washington's taste.

In 1966 the Council was enlarged to fifteen members, with nine affirmative votes needed for action. That meant gathering seven votes for death by abstention. By then Gaullist France was no longer dependable, our Latin American allies had joined the Africans and Asians and a developing nations bloc of surprising solidarity and a shift in Chinese representation from Taipei to Peking was written all over the wall. Under these circumstances, collecting seven votes in the Security Council on race-related issues like South Africa or Rhodesia or even-handedness between Arabs and Israelis came to look much harder to Washington than overcoming its moral scruples about the veto.

But it was not until 1970 that the first veto was cast—on a proposal to apply sanctions to Rhodesia. The score is now the Soviet Union 110 vetoes (nearly half of them to prevent new members from coming in), France 6, Britain 13, the United States 12, and China 3, one by the Nationalists and two by the Communists.

What has confused many Americans is the wrinkle that the veto doesn't apply to "procedural matters," and the question of whether seating the Palestine Liberation Organization in the United Nations Security Council is "procedural."

The gentlemenly crowd that wrote the United Nations Charter did not think to cover the case came up this week, in which a claim to par was put forward by an organization that was much to be a government but isn't. For the Security Council to decide that a non-governmental organization can be seated at the Council table is a "procedural matter"; it's more like an unwritten way of amending the charter.

Yet even the United States agreed the matter "procedural." Did Washington have an after walking out of the Council would not have it from working. That was proved in recent hectic weekend in June 1950, when Washington mounted a major military operation in Korea. A Security Council mandate while the Russian absenting themselves on a matter of principle better part of valor was obviously to no constitutional objection, as Ambassador Patrick Moynihan lucidly did, and then to matter as procedural anyway.

The trouble with the word "veto" is that it accentuates the negative. But if everybody has to negotiate, have to keep on negotiating—in for a quick vote to record the disagreement at home in time for dinner. And if the five permanent members—can agree, then very important actions can be taken by the Security Council "on behalf of" the United Nations nearly of membership.

In the United Nations first 30 years, this has already made possible a score of peace operations, three of which are now deployed in the Middle East, and many missions to serve as party mediators, election observers, and intern "marriage counselors" in fractious disputes.

Paradoxically then, the threat of veto may be the brightest signpost on the road to consensus. Not voting, is the decision-making most likely to lead in the United Nations to men about action rather than disagreement words.

Middle America, But More Liberal Than Supposed

A Political Profile of Iowa Shows Changes

By DAVID SCHOENBAUM

IOWA CITY—Although the first primary election, in New Hampshire, is still more than a month away, the nation is about to receive, in Iowa, a tentative first indication of popular preferences in this year's Presidential election campaign.

Perhaps 35,000 Iowa Democrats will convene tomorrow night in precinct caucuses in living rooms, school gyms and church basements to begin the process of selecting delegates to the national convention. Another 20,000 are expected to meet in Republican caucuses, although only 2 percent will be polled officially.

As carried on later at county, Congressional district and state conventions, the selection process will eventually produce delegations for both parties' national gatherings that reflect the enthusiasm, confusion or indifference of Iowans. But the main significance of tomorrow's voting will be symbolic. Whatever the outcome for both Democrats and Republicans, the losers will probably call the results aberrations or insignificant winners will find great importance in them. The winners may have a better case; Iowa is not what it used to be.

Believed by outsiders to be flat, provincial and congenitally conservative, Iowa has in the last few decades, almost unperceived, become a state that sends trade delegations to Eastern Europe, where smalltown banks reinvest the state employees' pension funds in New York City bonds, whose registered Democrats hold a plurality and where liberal Republicans, unlike conservative Republicans, frequently win major elections. The hills, of course, have been around for some time.

Paradoxically, Iowa has become more interesting as demographic changes reduced its House delegation from 11 to six, and carried armies of Iowans to both coasts. The remainder have been transformed into a reasonable facsimile of the pollster's—and politician's—vision of Middle America. Iowa was on the winning side in six of the last seven Presidential elections: 1960 was a near miss. But the kinks and deviations are notable, too.

Polls, statistics and voting behavior reinforce the impression of a state population recognizably like a large majority of its fellow citizens but in suggestive ways both a little more and a little less so. Iowa ranks 25th among the 50 states in population and area, 22d in population density and 20th in personal income, coinciding almost exactly with the national median income. The urban-rural ratio of 60:40 approximates the national average of 70:30. So does the age structure, which falls about 2 percent below the national average in the 21-to-44-year-old group, while exceeding it by about 2 percent in the 65 and over group.

Where Iowa Is Different

Moving away from the mean, the state is 17th in per-pupil school expenditure, 18th in legislative salaries, eighth in property tax assessments, fourth in per-capita retail sales, and second in farm marketing income, agricultural exports, beef on feed, and corn production per acre. At the other end of the scale, Iowa is 46th in per-capita Federal aid, December unemployment, reported at 8.3 percent nationwide, was 5.9 percent in Iowa, up from only 3.4 percent the year before.

The consistently independent, matter-of-factly liberal performance both of Iowa voters and their elected representatives might be a clue to what the caucuses will do. Since 1968, Iowa's Congressional delegation has shifted from two Democrats of seven Representatives to five of six, and on the Senate side from two conservative Republicans to two conspicuously liberal Democrats. Senator Dick Clark has recently investigated corruption in the grain trade and Central Intelligence Agency activity in Angola, and Senator John Culver has chipped at the defense budget from a seat on the Armed Services Committee. Though Iowa retains its right-to-work law, Senators Clark and Culver voted recently for the common situs picketing bill, evidence that labor plays an important part in Iowa's Democratic politics.

With their fingers to constituent pulses, the five Democratic Representatives voted ultimately for President Ford's proposed Federal loan to New York City. Only Republican Charles Grassley, who succeeded staunchly conservative H. R. Gross in 1974, voted against the loan.

Governor Robert D. Ray, the Republican successor to Democrat Harold Hughes, has vetoed a bill to permit wiretapping, resisted calling out the National Guard against student demonstrators, appeared at a rock festival to wish participants a lawful good time, professionalized the state judiciary and regularly said no to the highway lobby. He has had three re-election victories.

Recent polls also suggest what is likely to be on Iowans' minds when they get to their caucuses tomorrow night. A huge majority, 83 percent, favors stricter rules for food stamp eligibility; people with incomes under $5,000 feel the same way. About three out of five Iowans feel that their wages lag behind inflation. Grain sales to the Soviet Union are favored by more than two-thirds of rural residents, but by only about half of those who live in urban areas. About half of poll respondents say that they worry a lot about the stag crime rate, but 35 percent attribute it to unemployment, twice as many as trace it to any other cause.

By a respectable Iowa bedtime tomorrow, there should be some straws in the icy wind, not to mention any number of unmittened fingers held up to it at various points from the Potomac to Southern California. Whether Iowans will have spotted a winner is another story. But there are reasons to suspect that what didn't play in Iowa, might not play in Peoria—or New York and Kansas City either—whatever the losers may say on Tuesday morning.

What Mr. Kissinger said he did is not illegal but is regarded by many private experts as equivalent to recording a call. In some states, though not in Washington, D.C., the law requires a person recording a call to warn the other party.

The suit in which Mr. Kissinger is a defendant was filed by Morton H. Halperin, who is seeking damages because wiretaps were placed on his phone by the F.B.I. in response to the Nixon Administration's concern with what were termed national security leaks. Last week, depositions were also taken from Mr. Nixon and H. R. Haldeman, his chief of staff; they have not yet been made public.

Gulf Chairman Pays for Payoffs

The chairman of the Gulf Oil Corporation, one of the nation's largest companies, has been dismissed because the firm made secret payments to politicians in the United States and overseas. The dismissal was the strongest response so far in the business community to a scandal that has touched a number of major companies.

The chairman, Bob R. Dorsey, was fired after a report ordered by the Securities and Exchange Commission confirmed that the corporation had made payments of more than $12 million, much of it through a concealed "slush fund." The report concluded that the domestic payments were "shot through with illegality" and that Mr. Dorsey "perhaps chose" to shut his eyes to what was going on.

The commission has said that it is investigating about 30 major American firms that may have made illegal contributions to domestic politicians or secret payments to foreign politicians and officials. Several have already admitted such payments.

The dismissal of Mr. Dorsey was reportedly engineered by a group of Gulf directors associated with the Mellon family interests. They were said to believe that Gulf would continue to bear an ethical stigma unless the chairman were removed.

Protecting Nuclear Plants

The Federal Nuclear Regulatory Commission is preparing to recommend that Congress consider, instead of creating a special police force to guard nuclear power plants, training Army units to prepare for attacks on the installations by terrorist groups.

Congress had asked the commission for a recommendation on security because of the danger that a few pounds of plutonium, a reprocessed nuclear fuel that may soon be used in many of the nation's 55 nuclear power plants, could be made into an atomic bomb by a terrorist organization.

The commission decided that a Federal police force would not give significantly greater protection than now provided by private guards. A study prepared for the commission concluded that only a well-trained military force could successfully attack a nuclear installation and that such an attack would call for a military response. No such attack has ever occurred.

Miss Moore: Life

Sara Jane Moore has been sentenced to life imprisonment for trying to assassinate Gerald Ford, just as Lynette Alice Fromme was last month.

Like Miss Fromme, Miss Moore pointed a gun at the President during one of his campaign visits in California, but there are differences between the two cases. Miss Fromme did not fire a bullet and claimed she did not intend to; Miss Moore intended to and did, missing the President by feet. Miss Fromme is a follower of the cult figure and murderer, Charles Manson; Miss Moore has been an F.B.I. informer, and had been ostracized by radical organizations suspicious of her loyalty.

The evidence presented in Miss Moore's case has been sealed by the Federal district court judge in San Francisco who passed sentence. The reasons were not given; Federal investigators maintain that no evidence of a conspiracy has been found.

Summary

Campaign: and Out at White House

President Ford last week appointed C. B. Morton to the White staff to help overcome some of the difficulties as a candidate for the Presidency, but the manner in which the appointment was itself created a problem. Mr. Morton was put on the public payroll standard pre-Watergate manner, but got a post-Watergate re-assignment to the White House immediately.

Morton, a former chairman of the Republican National Committee, is widely respected by both party wings and the right wing. He was counselor with Cabinet rank, domestic and economic policy and in fact will help coordinate Ford's campaign.

The White House was reluctant to define Mr. Morton's role. It would have only "incidental liaison" with the President's organization and therefore 600 salary would be paid from funds. The chairman of the Election Commission immediately said that failure to report at the end of Mr. Morton's salary as a campaign cost would constitute a violation of the new campaign expenditure statutes. The White House also immediately said that President Ford would take any steps to comply with the law.

Ford also lost an aide last week for similar reasons. As expected, the firing of Labor John T. Dunlop as a direct consequence of Ford's veto of a construction bill favored by labor, supported by Mr. Dunlop and, initially, Ford. Mr. Ford has tacitly suggested he reversed himself to conservative support. The veto is all chance of labor backing as a respected member of his staff.

While Mr. Ford was having the s of a decision-making incumbent, Ronald Reagan was having those of a national candidate getting, for time, sustained close attention. What he is saying, what he seems to have disclosed, intuitively, is that the former Governor is more conservative than his detractors may have

Reagan's Solution

Reagan has advanced the idea of an important way of reducing expenditures is to transfer large social programs to the states, which would then decide what programs to fund at what level of expense, and air citizens accordingly. Last week, Mr. Reagan acknowledged that persons — especially blacks in the states — might be hurt by it. His proposed remedy was to migrate.

He can vote with your feet in entry," he said. Millions of southern blacks have done exactly that, in large part because Mr. Reagan said the northern urban ghettos now inhabit are one of the major domestic problems. Mr. Reagan also expressed the opinion that a plan would not produce much exodus; the South, he said, has its racial attitudes considered.

problem of financing Mr. Reagan has raised is one that also concerns President Ford. In the past, President Ford has proposed a ceiling on programs because of their cost. There have been reports he reversed himself, at least in part, to support the state-level political help give national races their shape will formally begin, with Republican and Democratic caucuses (the state does not have a primary). What happens there probably have limited impact on the Reagan-Ford contest, but it is the official competition between the candidates, and therefore an unity to score psychologically.

The Democrats, Iowa may have significance. SEN declared late, have been jostling for things none may find, any would find well if he matched the support of an uncommitted delegation.

Kissinger's Life Was Busy

Secretary of State Henry Kissinger said in a court deposition that during the Nixon Administration his secretary listened in on his telephone conversations, without the knowledge of Nixon at the other end of the line. The summaries of the conversations later made by the secretaries and Kissinger said, those summaries are now in his control. The summaries listening and summarizing were done while Mr. Kissinger was also President's advisor for national security affairs, a position he no longer

Little Time Remains for a Challenge on the Left

Ford May Be the G.O.P.'s Only 'Liberal' Alternative

By E. W. APPLE JR.

DUBUQUE, Iowa—"I'm beginning to wonder," a Republican official here commented this week, "whether we don't need some other option besides Ford and Reagan. Is there any chance we'll get it?"

As President Gerald Ford and former Gov. Reagan of California move toward their first formal joust—a marginally important one in the Iowa caucuses tomorrow and a highly significant one in New Hampshire on Feb. 24—some Republicans find Mr. Ford inept and Mr. Reagan too conservative.

But it seems highly likely that they will have to settle on one or the other. The prospects of a successful "third force" in the fight for the 1976 Republican Presidential nomination appear dim.

Not that there is a dearth of possible candidates to the left of the two active contenders. Among them are:

Nelson A. Rockefeller. The Vice President has carefully separated himself from the President on such key issues as aid to New York City and has sedulously avoided ruling himself out of the race.

Elliot L. Richardson. The incoming Secretary of Commerce made it clear before returning from his ambassadorial post in London that his national political thirst remains unquenched; he brings to the party the invaluable asset of having been on the "right" side of Watergate.

Charles H. Percy. The Illinois Senator was gearing up for the race before Mr. Ford became President.

Howard H. Baker Jr. The Senator from Tennessee is more conservative than the rest, but also "clean" on Watergate. He has talked from time to time about entering primaries.

Charles McC. Mathias Jr. The Maryland Senator has complained that Republican moderates are being abandoned every time Mr. Ford has made a gesture of pacification to the conservatives.

None of them has been willing to enter the contest so far, at least in part because they fear that in a three-way contest any one of them would take more votes from Mr. Ford than from Mr. Reagan, thereby helping the conservative Californian. Indeed, Mr. Mathias is now exploring the possibility of a fourth-party candidacy as the best means of giving moderate and liberal Republicans a choice.

Of the three possible courses the campaign could take—an early Ford victory, an early Reagan victory or a protracted struggle between them—two would appear to militate against a meaningful challenge from the left.

If Mr. Ford knocks Mr. Reagan out of the contest in the first weeks of the campaign (by winning, for example, the New Hampshire, Florida and Illinois primaries by healthy margins), most moderates say they would be prepared to rally behind him.

"We would hope, in that case," a prominent senator who asked not to be identified has said, "to persuade the President that he should prepare for the general election by moving back to the center."

If the early primaries are indecisive and the Ford-Reagan battle continues into May, the moderates' disinclination to split the moderate and liberal vote will be reinforced. Such a protracted struggle would polarize Republicans so severely that the only way to be effectively anti-Reagan would be to be, however reluctantly, pro-Ford.

Only if Mr. Reagan were to knock Mr. Ford out of the campaign in the early stages (and Mr. Ford says he will stay in, come what may) would there be a clear opening for a moderate or liberal candidate.

"If that happens," said Iowa's Gov. Robert D. Ray, a leading moderate, "and I don't think it will, then you probably will see someone jump in. But it will be terribly difficult, almost impossible."

Only Mr. Rockefeller has the national reputation that would be required for a late-starting campaign. He has been weakened, analysts believe, by his dalliance with Southern conservatives and by his role in the practices that led to the collapse of New York City's fiscal affairs and to the fiscal problems of the state. But even without those developments, there seems little reason to believe that he could win in 1976 what eluded him in 1960, 1964 and 1968.

Any late entrant would labor under severe financial handicaps. Qualifying for Federal matching funds under the new financing laws is a necessity to compete against a Reagan in full flight. The most efficient of the Democrats needed two months to do that, and the time just would not be available. A Rockefeller decided to get in, say, after the Illinois primary March 16. Two months later only three weeks of the primary season would be left.

Under the new financing law, furthermore, millionaires like Mr. Rockefeller and Mr. Percy would be unable to take up the slack. The law permits them and their families to contribute only $50,000 to their own campaigns.

Filing deadlines are another problem. The deadline for the Tennessee primary, for instance, is March 4, only two days after the Massachusetts voting. That is probably too soon for Mr. Baker to make an informed decision.

Republican moderates and liberals do well in gubernatorial and senatorial elections in major states; in fact, of the Republican Senators from the 10 largest states, only two, John G. Tower of Texas and James L. Buckley of New York, are conservatives. Three are moderates and five, liberals.

But they are chosen by the electorate at large in their states. Presidential nominees are not; they are not even chosen by all Republican voters. They are chosen by people who feel deeply enough to vote in primaries and at caucuses. Just as those in the Democratic party tend to be liberals, those in the Republican party tend to be conservatives.

For all that, the moderates are keeping their options open. The Vice President may be doing more than that. At his direction, the New York Republican leadership has declared that it will take an uncommitted delegation to the convention something it surely would not have done if Mr. Rockefeller's Presidential ambitions had been dampened.

Brave Justices to Define 'Rational' Sex Distinctions

The United States Supreme Court has agreed to review a case that raises the question of the extent to which a state may properly draw legal distinctions between men and women.

The outcome could give an indication of what the court considers constitutionally valid reasons for treating the sexes differently. The case involves an Oklahoma law that forbids males from drinking beer until age 21 but allows females to drink at age 18.

The court generally has held that states must have a rational basis for classifying men and women differently but the classification violates the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Oklahoma contends that it does have such a rational basis: statistics showing that men are more likely than women to drink beer, to drive after drinking and to be arrested for drunkenness.

Proponents of women's rights have urged the court to require states to demonstrate a "compelling interest" in distinctions between the sexes, not merely a rational basis for them. These are some of the decisions the Court handed down last week:

• It upheld a lower court ruling that sections of New York State's fair campaign practices code and of the election law that authorized it violated First Amendment guarantees of freedom of speech. The decision cast doubt upon the validity of similar provisions in 18 other states, and it may remove inhibitions against personal attacks in New York.

The invalidated sections of the New York code, which was intended to discourage scurrilous campaign methods, prohibits a candidate from making racial attacks on his opponent or misrepresenting the opponent's qualifications. The Supreme Court did not write a decision in the case. The lower court considered the provision invalid because it was not precise enough in describing prohibited statements.

• Removed the exemption that imported goods now enjoy from state and local taxation. The ruling will not interfere with the nation's international trade agreements because states will not be able to tax imported goods at a rate higher than domestic goods.

Since the Constitution gives the Federal Government exclusive authority to levy import duties, the Court had held in 1871 that foreign goods still in the possession of importers were not subject to such state levies as property or inventory taxes. In its unanimous decision last week, the court overturned that precedent. The justices held that state taxation of domestic and imported goods equally did not infringe upon the Federal Government's authority to regulate foreign commerce.

• Agreed to decide whether the Federal Government must prepare a special Environmental Impact study covering Montana, Wyoming and North and South Dakota before granting leases for coal mining there. The area contains one of the richest coal deposits in the nation and exploration there is an important part of the Ford Administration's energy development plans. Mining companies estimate that a special study of the four states could delay coal extraction by two years or more.

The Government contends it is entitled to proceed immediately with the leasing on the basis of a nationwide environmental study of proposed coal mining. However, conservation groups argue that a regional study is required by law.

The Overflowing Alabama Jails

A judge in Alabama, declaring that incarceration in any of the state's prisons amounts to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Constitution, has directed that a long list of specific improvements be made.

Federal courts in a number of states have found some prison conditions unconstitutional, but in the Alabama case Judge Frank M. Johnson Jr. went into great detail about all aspects of prison life. He laid down 44 guidelines designed to eliminate overcrowding, poor sanitary and dietary conditions, inadequate medical care and violence among inmates. Alabama's prisons, like those in Florida and nine other Southern states, are seriously overcrowded.

The judge's order was also unusual in that it created an enforcement mechanism: a citizens review board to monitor improvements and report to the court. The judge, moreover, warned state officials that they could be held personally liable for monetary damages if they failed to comply.

The state intends to appeal the ruling. The Governor, George C. Wallace, contends that the state has insufficient funds to make the improvements ordered by the court.

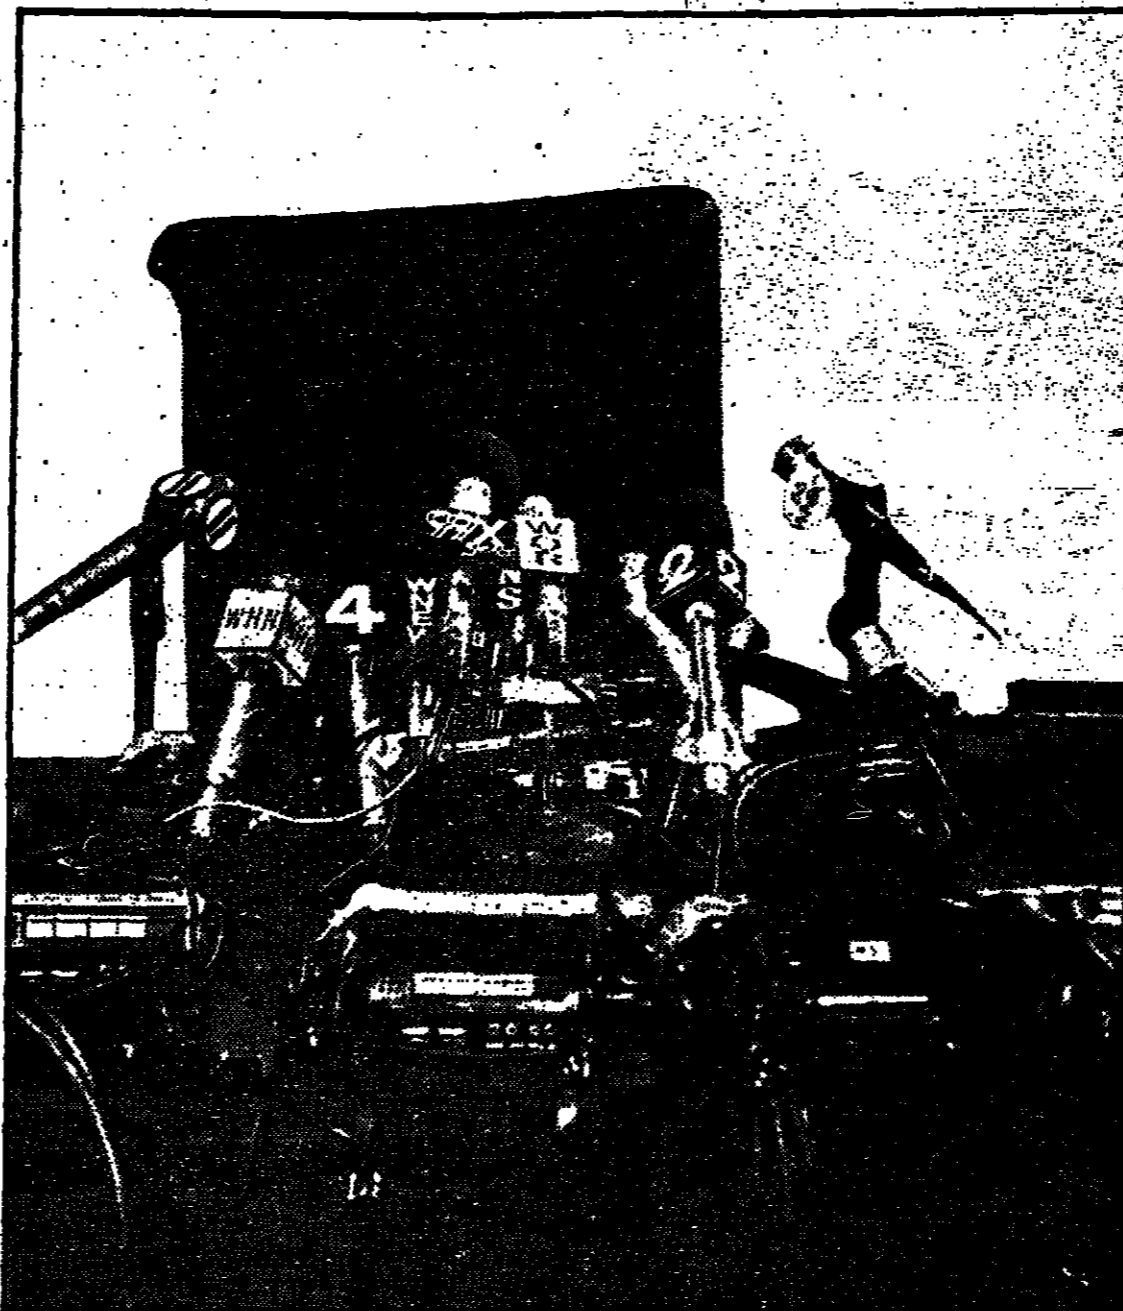

A New Gag Order

A judge in Brooklyn has imposed a gag order on reporters in an unsuccessful attempt to stop publication of the backgrounds of defendants in a murder trial. It was the latest in a series of such orders, whose constitutional validity is now under review by the United States Supreme Court. Justice John R. Starkey of State Supreme Court issued the order, he said, to help prevent the jury from learning that some of the defendants had previously been in a related case. The New York Times printed the information despite the order.

News gathering organizations have urged the Supreme Court to find that gag orders amount to prior restraint of publication and violate the First Amendment.

Nessen's Problem: He's A Shield With a Thin Skin

By JAMES M. NAUGHTON

WASHINGTON—One of President Ford's senior campaign aides said he nearly drove his car off Massachusetts Avenue the other day while guffawing at a radio news account that Rogers C. B. Morton was being appointed White House counselor on domestic and economic issues.

"Economic policy!" the campaign aide hooted a day later, recalling his surprise. "Rog Morton on economic policy!" In fact, as the campaign official knew, the press suspected, departing Commerce Secretary Morton conceded and, by week's end the White House was finally acknowledging, Mr. Morton's principal role in the Executive Mansion was to give some belated coordination to Mr. Ford's disjointed Presidential candidacy.

The flap occasioned by the Morton announcement—Democrats and even the Republican chairman of the Federal Elections Commission openly questioned paying Mr. Morton $44,600 from tax funds to engage in partisan politics—served as one illustration of the current nature of President Ford's press relations.

In and out of the White House there were those who quickly suggested that Ron Nessen, the Presidential Press Secretary, had botched the announcement by trying to persuade a skeptical White House press corps that Mr. Morton would give but "incidental" attention to politics. "You have to expect that from a girgin White House," said a Ford campaign official. "The choice of the word 'incidental' was unfortunate," said a White House aide.

But the subject of Mr. Morton's salary and how to submerge his political function in a job description of White House "counselor" had been the topic of conversation among Presidential aides and had been cleared, it was suggested authoritatively, by Mr. Ford himself. Only by indirection did anyone try, though, to blame the President for the snafu.

Mr. Nessen accepted the blame. To hear his associates tell it, he did so willingly. They said that

Mr. Nessen was pleased in a perverse sense the National Press Club recently issued a report crediting the President with restoring civil White House press relations and chastising Nessen for flaws in the White House communications process. The report, said one friend of Nessen's, bolstered his confidence that it was his keep by "drawing a certain amount of fire and heat away from the President."

That interpretation sounded like a familiar one on the part of the Press Secretary, the study said, among other things that his press relations in China last year had been "the most inept performance of his career"—but it at least underlined what was common to Presidential press policies: to aim more at insulating the President than lightning the public.

As the press club study panel noted, Mr. Nessen has been uncommonly accessible in 17 months. He conducted 24 news conferences (former President Nixon held 37 in 67 months) and afforded correspondents the option of a question. He submitted to "innumerable interviews" and began recently to hold semi-formal sessions with groups of journalists. He attended functions at reporters' homes and partied in press here and in Vail, Colo. He writes congratulatory notes to journalists of his acquaintance by promotion or win awards. He calls many press by first names, although he keeps to Aldo Beckman of The Chicago Tribune and Jules Witcover of The Washington "Post."

If his predecessors have been calculating common view is that President Kennedy, President Johnson and President Nixon bugged the press—there is a prevailing opinion that Mr. Ford's cordiality is sincere, no mere reflection of an open personality.

Presidential Reassurances

Mr. Ford "doesn't complain" about negative accounts and rarely indulges in "mild grating" at unfair printed gossip about his family. He lacks of sensitive information, according to Secretary. When Mr. Nessen, who clearly dreads the press, feels depressed, he is said to be by the President, "Do what you think. Don't let it get you down."

There are, though, some close to Mr. Ford who believe, on the basis of their observations, that his geniality is at least partly calculated and accessibility is attuned as much to the positive climate of political openness as it is to Ford's instinctive amiability.

"My theory," said a senior White House aide, "is that it bugs him nearly as much as it bugs others when he gets an unfair rap, but imagine him saying it out loud. It's a political personality. Down deep he has the rule: 'Don't attack the press.'"

Genuine or not, Mr. Ford's attitude in good stead. Presidents always try to do the press they can do no wrong. The press looks for Presidential flaws. The process leads to gradual disenchantment on both Mr. Ford's case, the President and the public on good personal terms—and Mr. Nessen become the object of growing dislike or among the correspondents, some of who as soon bait him as question him now. To Mr. Nessen for the evasions, obfuscation in the case of the Morton announcement casual shams.

Mr. Nessen more likely does what he does ever well, on the basis of policy. An aide was current late last year that Mr. Ford on the verge of replacing his spokesman. Mr. Nessen has remained and probably will be at his post in the foreseeable future. So long as he is to be the object of scorn that might otherwise be directed at his boss, Mr. Nessen admires the President's purposes.

Another Liberal Governor Speaks Conservatively

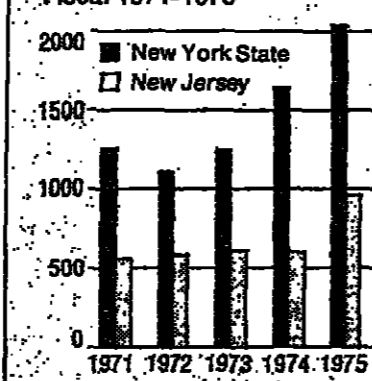

Governor Byrne, in opening the new session of the New Jersey Legislature last week, appears to have changed both his philosophy and his approach to government: A liberal Democrat, he offered a basically conservative program as did New York's Governor Carey, also a liberal Democrat. Both called for less spending, less government, more help for business. And Governor Byrne's reasons were the same as Mr. Carey's: There is little money to spend, and business opportunities must be improved if unemployment is to be reduced and tax revenues increased.

Governor Byrne called for tax incentives. He also suggested, as did Governor Carey, that environmental laws, prized by liberals in the 1960's, be re-examined to determine whether they inhibit the expansion of companies in the state and discourage other companies from moving in.

The changes in business taxes are part of the Governor's program for tax reform, and he appears to be using the approach to business as one weapon in his fight to get a state income tax. He has failed in the past, despite overwhelming Democratic majorities in both houses of the Legislature.

expected to raise the projected state deficit from $800 million to close to $1.2 billion, may well induce reluctant lawmakers to approve the income tax, defeated five times. It is generally agreed that only an income tax can resolve such a large deficit without the dismissal of many state employees, although some Republicans believe an increase and extension of the sales tax could handle the problem. The regressive nature of such a tax, however, is believed to limit its chance of passage.

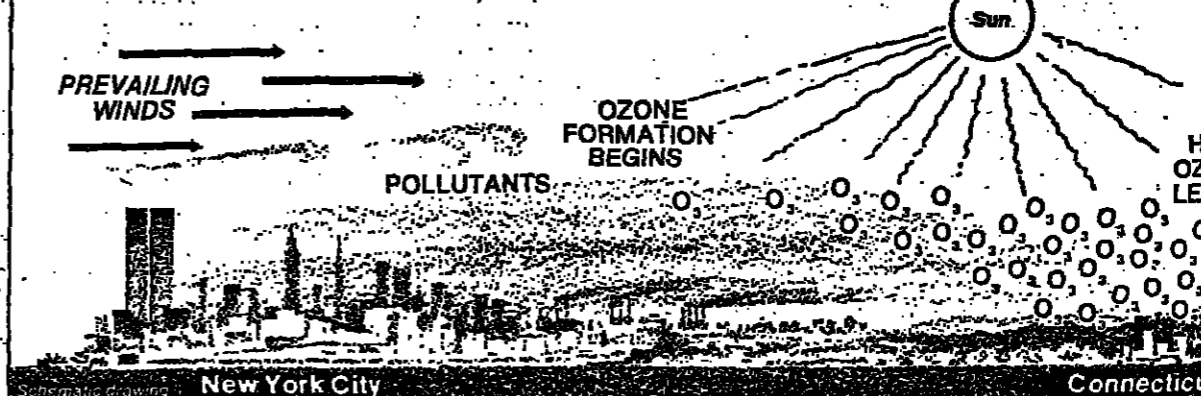

The need to lend assistance to business is generally recognized in both New York and New Jersey. Bankruptcies have gone up about 25 percent in New York and 30 percent in New Jersey in the last year, and government unemployment figures in November were 10.3 and 10.0 percent respectively, far above the national unadjusted rate of 7.8.

Mr. Byrne's message was surprisingly innovative, given what is generally considered his rather static performance in his first two years in office. He called for reorganization of governmental agencies to cut staffs and also to serve as a message to the public that efforts are being made to economize; he asked for stronger penalties for "unscrupulous" nursing home operators, in a proposal bound to excite and anger home-rule minded residents, the Governor asked for a close state examination of spending by municipalities.

In New York, Governor Carey is struggling with a $900 million deficit and appears to have changed part of his strategy for resolving it. As recently as two weeks ago, Mr. Carey was strongly suggesting that new taxes might be needed. Last week, he was said to be ready to propose instead an additional reduction in state programs, already scheduled for cuts of $600 million. His change of mind may be political strategy—to have new or increased taxes originate in the Legislature, and thus shift or at least share the political onus.

In his efforts to rescue four state agencies from default, the Governor has asked Felix Rohatyn, who was instrumental in saving New York City from default, to put together a financial package that would permanently

The Path of Pollution

New York City's auto and industrial pollutants, transformed into ozone by the sun, have their most serious effect in Connecticut and parts of Massachusetts 200 miles northeast of the city.

The City Exports Some Dirty Air

The worst effects of photochemical air pollution originating in New York City and the immediately surrounding area are visited on the neighboring states to the northeast, researchers have found. Connecticut and Massachusetts pay for the area's environmental sins because of a delayed chemical reaction. Ozone, which in heavy concentrations is an irritating and possibly dangerous pollutant, is created by the reaction of the sun's rays on certain compounds emitted by autos and industry. But the reaction takes a few hours. By that time, air currents can have carried the

An Unexpected Delay for Nadjari

The momentum in the controversy surrounding the New York State Special Prosecutor Maurice Nadjari, subsided temporarily last week. The hiatus was caused by the death of State Supreme Court Justice John M. Murtagh and the unexpected trouble Attorney General Louis Lefkowitz has had finding a special deputy to investigate politically sensitive aspects of attempted dismissal of Mr. Nadjari.

Last week, Justice Murtagh special judge for Mr. Nadjari's motion cases, was preparing to whether the special prosecutor's jury had the authority to subpoena Patrick Cunningham, state Democratic chairman. Mr. Cunningham is now clear authority, will be formalized in an executive order from the Governor, to look into political corruption in the 1st district where Mr. Cunningham is county executive. He is also politically close to Mr. Carey. The Governor has named State Supreme Court Justice Leonard D. Sandler to take Mr. Murtagh's function. The Cunningham case will presumably be Sandler's introduction to his assignment.

Mr. Lefkowitz is having more trouble getting a lawyer to head the investigation demanded by the Governor in Nadjari's charge that Mr. Carey tried to dismiss the Special Prosecutor because he was investigating Democrats. The political sense of the assignment is apparently complicating the search.

Carey's Men: Some Old, Some New, and Mr. Carey Himself

By LINDA GREENHOUSE

Governor Carey last week submitted to the State Senate confirmation of the names of the 106 people he has named to various state agencies and commissions since the legislature ended its regular session last July.

Patrick J. Cunningham, the Bronx Democratic leader whom Mr. Carey installed as one of his first post-election acts.

But the continuing controversy over Mr. Carey's attempt to dismiss Maurice H. Nadari, the special state prosecutor who has since accused Mr. Cunningham of being "the principal at the center of the corrupt marketplace" for judgeships in the Bronx, has obviously meant a major change in, if not suspension of, the relationship between the two.

As the first year progressed, the importance of Mr. Carey's actual staff, the people with titles, rose perceptibly. David Burke, the Governor's secretary (an Albany misnomer for a job that is really that of a combined chief of staff and chief strategist), quickly won Mr. Carey's confidence for his valuable combination of political and fiscal skills.

Mr. Burke, who had left a job as Senator Edward J. Kennedy's chief of staff for the vice presidency of a major brokerage house, the Dreyfus Corporation, had not even met Mr. Carey until he was approached by David Garth some weeks after election day.

A Mixture of Styles

The son of a Brookline, Mass., policeman, Mr. Burke's clipped Boston accent and direct manner give him a somewhat austere image, in contrast with the arm-around-the-shoulder style of Judah Gribetz, the Governor's counsel.

Mr. Gribetz resigned as New York City Deputy Mayor to take the counsel's job, one of the most sensitive in any Governor's administration. He is regarded as sharing the top adviser role with Mr. Burke, and during the city crisis played a significant role as an intermediary between his present boss, the Governor, and his previous boss, Mayor Beame.

Nearly equal with these two in influence with the Governor is Robert Morgado, the director of state operations. A fiscal specialist with the Assembly Ways and Means Committee, he joined the transition staff after election day as one of the few people with direct knowledge of Albany.

His experience proved particularly valuable to the Governor. A Democrat, he had worked for the Assembly's Republican leadership and initially had the best grasp among any of the new Governor's advisers of the dimensions of the impending fiscal crisis.

Peter Goldmark, the Governor's budget director, is not called on for the kind of free-wheeling political advice that these three provide daily. But neither is he relegated to the role of technician that some have recently described. Extremely knowledgeable about state and city finance, Mr. Goldmark nursed the Municipal Assistance Corporation and the Emergency Financial Control Board into existence and also has established the best relationship of any of the Governor's inner circle with the Democrats in the Legislature.

This is an asset for a Governor whose legislative relationships have been polite at best. "He's the only guy who has kept across-the-board credibility with us," one Democratic staff aide said last week.

The only example of a bland-sounding job title masking a position of major influence in the Carey administration is Dr. Kevin Cahill, the chairman of the Health Planning Council. Dr. Cahill is a close personal friend of the Governor's and also a relative by marriage. He was the only official singled out for praise in the Governor's State of the State message this month. His major trouble-shooting assignment for Mr. Carey was the medical malpractice crisis last spring, but the Governor often seeks his advice on nonmedical subjects as well.

Beyond this circle are other people the Governor consults, both in and out of his government. Any assessment of influence in the administration, one top adviser points out, is as inherently misleading as a still from a motion picture: It lends a static appearance to what is the ever-changing product of mood, circumstance, chemistry and all the other factors that determine human relationships.

Harold Fisher, an influential lawyer and longtime friend, is often in the Governor's company. So is Mario Cuomo, the Secretary of State, and more recently John Helmsman, the new superintendent of banks. During the fiscal crisis, Mr. Carey raised to an art form the technique of turning to outside experts: Richard Ravitch on the Urban Development Corporation, Felix G. Rohatyn and an array of other top businessmen from the private sector on New York City. By all reports, advising Mr. Carey is a non-stop process, not a matter at all of preparing formal briefing papers setting out various options for the top executive to consider. "The Governor is part of the process," one of the aides mentioned here said the other day. "He's always thinking, he's into everything. That's what makes him hard to work for. On the other hand, he happens to be smarter than most people, so it would be a waste if he weren't involved all through the process."

Other aides use virtually the same words to describe a process that is both a boon and a drawback in their work lives.

The experience can be harrowing, as Mr. Carey changes assignments and questions in midstream. He can be a strong, even intimidating presence. Perhaps for that reason, one aide not in the Governor's inner circle said, "People tend to 'yes' the Governor more than they should. He can be mean."

Success in briefing the Governor reportedly comes to those who abide by certain laws of survival: the staff has developed over the months. Mr. Carey is never to be presented with a decision as a fait accompli. Attention to immediate problems is suggested, not demanded—and suggested again tomorrow if the Governor appears to ignore the advice today.

Masked Incisiveness

Despite his seeming impatience or inattention, Mr. Carey notices everything, an experience that can be disconcerting to a staff member, or a reporter. "He can be gazing out the window, he can look right through you, you'll think he's not hearing a word, but the next day or the next week he'll suddenly bring it up and ask you what you've done about it," one cabinet-level adviser said.

Once a tentative decision has been made on an important issue, an aide said, the Governor often brings it to Harry J. O'Donnell, his director of communications, whose tenure in Albany dates back to the Dewey administration, to ask "How will this look?"

"It's not just technical advice," this adviser said. "Harry is very nonassertive, but his judgment counts."

Few of the people whose names are now before the Senate will ever hear that assessment made of them. To an adviser, those words are the sweetest music in the world, all the more so because he never knows how long the music will last.

Angola... a new Vietnam?

"We have no plans at present to send combat troops to South Vietnam" Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara, 10 November 1964

"The issue in Angola is not, never has been and never will be a question of U.S. forces" President Gerald Ford, 19 December 1975

Each day brings disturbing evidence of increasing U.S. involvement in the war in newly independent Angola. Already the U.S. is spending over fifty million dollars to supply arms, ammunition, armored cars, spotter planes and American pilots to two of the armies. Now the Ford administration is defying the Senate by throwing more money and guns into the conflict.

The U.S. intervention in Angola is consistent with an established policy of support for white minority rule in southern Africa. South Africa has invaded Angola to install a government which will be "safe" for continued white domination. Our government has allied itself with South Africa in this explosive situation.

This policy won't work any more than the policy of supporting Diem, Ky or Thieu did.

The Administration says its activities are only a response to Soviet aggression. But the New York Times reported (December 19): "The Ford Administration's initial authorization for substantial Central Intelligence Agency financial operations inside Angola came in January, 1975, more than two months before the first significant Soviet build-up, well-informed officials report."

Attacking the U.S.S.R. as a new "colonial imperial nation," the U.S. has proclaimed itself the defender of the freedom of the Angolan people. We protest this Administration pretense that its concern is the freedom of the Angolan people.

In 14 years of armed struggle against Portuguese colonialism, the Angolan people received help from many African, Asian, Scandinavian, and socialist countries. Where was the United States during the years of struggle? It was firmly backing the oppressive Portuguese dictatorship of Antonio Salazar.

We repudiate the U.S. claim that one of the parties in the conflict, the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA), is a Soviet puppet. Men and women who fought for their freedom for 14 years will not easily accept new foreign domination. The MPLA government, now recognized by 41 nations, including 22 African states, has pledged a policy of non-alignment.

We support the right of the Angolan people to determine their own future without outside intervention. As Americans, we must act to change our government's policy.

Your help is urgently needed. We are now at the crucial Gulf of Tonkin stage.

Act now. Organize. Demonstrate. Most important, call or write your representatives in Congress. Tell Congress to cut off all funds for the Angolan intervention.

Tests Produce Illusory Rise in Reading Scores

On a test of reading achievement given last April to more than 580,000 New York City public school pupils in grades two through nine, 45.2 percent were found to be reading at or above the test's normal level for their grades. In 1974, only 33.8 percent of the pupils tested were at or above grade level.

The contrast is unfortunately misleading. The two tests were not the same, and school officials have warned against concluding that reading performance had actually improved that much. In 1974 and previously, the test given was the Metropolitan Achievement Test; in 1975, the Stanford Achievement Test.

The main reason for the difference in results may lie in the national statistical samples used to create the tests' respective norms. The Metropolitan test norm was determined in 1968, the Stanford in 1973. During the five years, national reading performance may have declined, which would make the new test comparatively "easier." Moreover, since the new test was devised with more contribution from minority groups, it may be more nearly free from cultural bias.

The new results could permit more students to show the eighth-grade reading ability required for a high-school diploma, which now qualifies any graduate for admission to the City University. However, the University now plans to require new students to show eighth-grade ability on the University's own reading tests in order to reduce the cost of its remedial program.

New Approaches To Fusion

The basic problem confronting research toward the production of useful energy by nuclear fusion has been how to create, on a manageable scale, the extreme conditions of pressure and temperature under which the fusion reaction can take place. Current research concentrates on two different approaches to the same goal.

One method would use magnetic fields to heat and compress a large volume of nuclear fuel in gaseous form until fusion occurs. A second, newer approach would apply energy to a small pellet of nuclear fuel, crushing it to 1000 times its original density.

Recent developments here and in the Soviet Union indicate potentially significant changes in the effort to crush the fuel pellet. Soviet scientists are reported to be shifting their emphasis from the concentration of laser beams on the pellet to the use of converging electron beams, since sufficiently powerful lasers are still in the future while highly efficient electron-beam generators already exist.

The new American approach uses beams of ions, which are atoms stripped of some or all of their electrons. An advantage of the ions would be that since they are far heavier than electrons they deliver their energy to the pellet more efficiently.

The laser-beam approach is still pursued in both countries, however. Small fusion reactions resulting from the laser method, as well as from the gas-compression method, are reported to have already taken place.

If the fusion process can be mastered for the actual production of energy, an almost unlimited energy supply would result, since one of the fuel components (deuterium) occurs in all water, and the other (tritium) would be a by-product of fusion itself.

Text Goes In, Speech Comes Out of Machine

The long-sought development of practical "reading machines" for the blind people appears close to fruition because of advances in miniaturized electronics and computer programming.

The machines, or systems, will enable blind people to "read" at normal speed by converting printed or type-written texts into computerized speech. Based in part on advances in linguistic theory, the systems represent a large step beyond Braille texts, recordings and other reading aids.

Electronics miniaturization has changed the machines from cumbersome laboratory curiosities into practical devices for institutional or individual use. Progress in computer programming has resulted in the mechanical capability for analyzing the structure and pronunciation of words.

Basically, here is how the machines work:

A scanner moves along the printed text, photographing the words and sending them into a minicomputer as electronic signals. The computer analyzes the signals according to programmed rules for pronunciation, selects the correct pronunciation and sends a command for coded speech units to a speech-producing device. The device transforms the coded signals into language sounds.

One experimental machine was demonstrated last week by the Kurzweil Computer Products Inc. in Cambridge, Mass., and produced generally understandable speech that sounded vaguely Swedish-accented.

Though both the Senator and Mrs. Javits deny that there is a conflict of interest, the Senator is reportedly less than pleased with his wife's current duties.

The Death of Agatha Christie

Dame Agatha Christie, one of the world's most prolific mystery writers, died last week at the age of 85. In a career covering 55 years, Dame Agatha produced 60 detective novels, along with several plays, romantic novels and short story collections. Her two most familiar characters, the Belgian detective, Hercule Poirot, and the shrewd Englishwoman, Jane Marple, were featured in several detective novels that were hugely popular. Many went into ten and even 15 printings. Her play, "The Mousetrap," has already been performed more than 9,600 times on the London stage.

Reverse Bias: New Injustice?

By LESLEY OELSNER

WASHINGTON—At the Supreme Court, things are changing. Con-

On September 14, 1975, employees of a Texas trucking company were charged with "misprizing" company property. The company investigated, and fired the three. The two who were white, the third black. The white went to court, claiming they were being discriminated against on the basis of race. The lower court threw the case saying that whites couldn't sue under one of the two main rights laws used in employment cases, the Civil Rights Law of 1964 and the second law, even of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, didn't apply to the case either. The Supreme Court is going to that case—along with arguments from some "friends of court," the Court to give whites the rights to sue on racial grounds.

In Brooklyn a legislative redrafting got underway and new laws were drawn, devised to assure minorities their rights. The redrafting split up a single district that contained the Hasidic Jewish community in Williamsburg. The community representatives went to court, their voting rights were diminished because of redistricting based on race in violation of the Constitution.

The Supreme Court threw the case out, an appeals court affirmed. The Supreme Court will hear this case—along with friends of arguments from some of the people joining in the Texas case. They were concerned that the government's decision-making process could be unconstitutional liberties.

Supreme Court, not long ago, a lot of pleas from blacks who such things as the right to sue for the right to go to school were pleas from people subject to two centuries of discrimination, and for all the travail the Court's rulings in those cases might have caused some they were really somewhat cases. The case of the Texas trucking company is typical of the Court's curbing of the sense that there are cases with identical issues.

are often of the kind sometimes described as "reverse discrimination" cases.

In these, a non-minority contends that a program such as an "affirmative action" employment plan favors minorities over non-minorities and thus discriminates in reverse.

The phrase "reverse discrimination," however, is subject to various interpretations, and some observers therefore describe cases now on the docket differently.

The pattern evident on the docket, according to Eric Schnapper of the N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense and Education Fund, Inc., which is involved in some of the cases, is "the danger of regression."

For the arguments in many of these cases would, if accepted by the Court, erase many of the gains of recent years—both from statutes like the Voting Rights Act and the Civil Rights Act, and from Court rulings.

The various cases involving disputes between minorities and non-minorities—some of them perhaps classifiable as reverse discrimination but some not, some already accepted for review and some not—include several employment cases in which the issue is the type of remedy to be devised to assure a rightful place to blacks or others previously excluded from a company, or from the higher-ranking jobs there.

Seniority and 'Goals'

One case, already heard by the Court but not yet decided, raised the question of whether courts are barred from granting retroactive seniority to specific minority members who were excluded from jobs as a result of discrimination, and then hired belatedly.

The government and civil-rights groups contend that courts can grant this seniority and in fact often have to, in order to make sure the employee has the status—important during lay-offs—that he or she would have had but for the illegal discrimination. The retroactive seniority, of course, puts the employee ahead of some persons who actually started work before he or she did.

Other cases pending in the same general area raise progressively harder questions—including one involving the use of seniority lists to carry out layoffs in which the applicant general and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission have submitted differing views, with the E.O.C. taking a much more expansive view of what protections the minority-member employees are entitled to.

Another set of cases, not yet accepted for review, raises the issue of whether courts, in devising remedies to erase the effects of proven discrimination, can set "goals" for hiring and promotion specifying certain percentages of minority versus nonminority employees. Actually this is a fairly common practice by now.

arguing that such racially-conscious relief is unconstitutional.

Clearly, the remedies in some of these cases do affect whites to their detriment—when a black is given retroactive seniority that places him ahead of an incumbent white employee. Yet just as clearly, that fact alone does not make the remedies unconstitutional. In order to provide a minority its constitutional rights, the only possible way often is to give minority-group members a share in something, such as jobs, that previously only whites held. Obviously, by necessity, the whites lose a little.

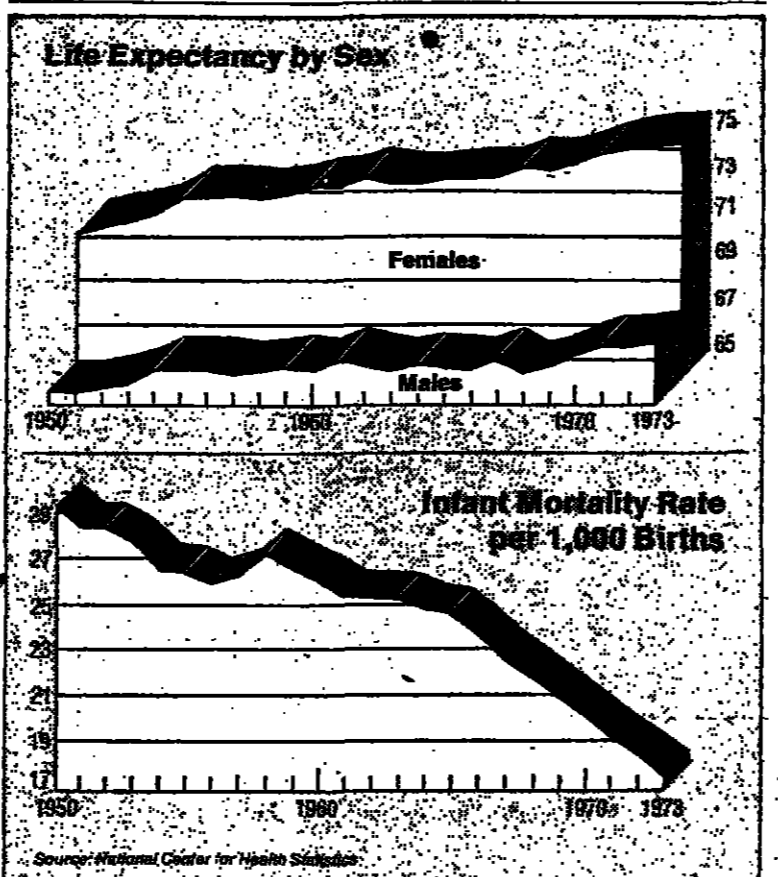

A test, Mr. Schnapper suggests, may be whether the minority-group member is restored to the position he or she would have had but for the discrimination, or whether, instead, the new position is better than he or she would have had. If it's better, then it seems open to challenge as reverse discrimination. Of course, there are other tests as well, the usual ones in litigation, such as the wording and legislative history of the relevant law—a test that will probably be important in the Texas trucking case, for example.

For the most part, the Court is facing these related issues for the first time—the specific issues, at least—and they are coming now, according to Jack Greenberg of the N.A.A.C.P. Fund, because it was only recently that the law and the courts began to afford the remedies, such as affirmative action, that are leading to some of the complaints.

The Court had an opportunity, in its 1973-1974 term, to decide on one reverse discrimination issue involving racial quotas used by universities in attempts to increase the number of minority students. Ultimately, however, it did not decide the case, finding after hearing argument, that it was moot.

Lesley Oelsner reports on the Supreme Court for The New York Times.

The Nation's Health

A report by the Federal Government, the first survey of its kind, has confirmed what was generally known about the nation's health: Americans as a people are healthy, are receiving increasing medical care and are living longer than they used to.

These findings are included in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare's first annual health report to Congress and the President as required by a law passed in 1974. The report attempts to merge statistics on health conditions, population trends and costs to help planners and policymakers.

The report notes that death rates are declining, for childbirth and heart disease but rising for cancer. A major barrier to further health improvement, the report said, is the American lifestyle that includes excessive use of alcohol and tobacco and the lack of proper exercise and diet.

Access to health care has improved considerably over the last decade as a result of expansion of medical facilities and health personnel, the report says. Despite the continuing rise in costs, the use of health services by poor people has grown. The population-physician ratio has decreased, but the geographic distribution of doctors continues to be uneven and heavily weighted toward metropolitan areas.

Two areas usually regarded as indicators of health conditions have shown steady improvement: The infant mortality rate since 1964 has declined an average of 4 percent a year; and life expectancy over the last 15 years has risen more than two years for men and more than four years for women.

The United States ranks 15th in the world in the infant mortality rate, 7th in life expectancy for women and 19th for men. The American infant mortality rate, it is generally believed, is attributable to the larger percentage of poor people in the United States compared with other industrialized nations. The poor generally have high infant death rates because of such factors as nutritional deficiencies and inadequate access to prenatal care.

Where We Stand

by Albert Shanker, President, United Federation of Teachers

Justice Delayed is Justice Denied

Board Refuses Arbitration on Sabbaticals

The American public has a distorted image of unions, derived from media coverage. The occasional strike gets big coverage, while years of peaceful existence under contract and labor-management cooperation are ignored. Good news is no news.

The collective bargaining relationship between the New York City Board of Education and the United Federation of Teachers is one of the oldest in the public sector and, until recently, one of the most mature and sophisticated. There have been sharp differences between the Board and the union. In 1962, 1967, 1968 and 1975 these differences were settled only after a strike occurred. And it is the strikes which were the focus of attention.

But in reality the strikes have been only brief episodes. The relationship between the Board and the union is better understood in terms of their joint efforts to recruit teachers during the period of teacher shortage; their sponsorship of programs of higher education for para-professionals; a cooperative venture to develop professional accountability, and joint efforts to eliminate the abuse of sick leave.

These cooperative efforts, and many others, are needed in our schools. They are possible because once a contract has been agreed upon, the parties recognize that the fighting is over and that both sides have a mission: making our schools perform successfully. Of course, conflicts are not confined to contract negotiations. Every day there are differences of opinion as to whether there has been a contract violation in a given school or, occasionally, on a systemwide basis.

Part of the genius of American labor relations is that labor and management have devised peaceful procedures for resolving disputes which arise during contract periods. When the employer is alleged to have violated the contract, the employee takes a grievance, the employee appeals. The initial appeals are to authorities within the school system, but if the matter is not resolved "within the family," both parties agree to abide by the decision of an outside, impartial arbitrator.

This is the system which—in spite of the headlines devoted to strikes and conflict—is typical of American labor relations and has resulted in peace and stability. And it is this procedure under which our schools have resolved disputes since 1962.

But now there seems to be a change on the part of the Board of Education. If the Board continues on its present course, the peaceful resolution of disputes will be at an end—and since no union can tolerate unilateral abrogation of contract—daily conflict will replace orderly procedures.

The Board's about-face can be seen in its treatment of the conflict on sabbatical leaves. In the negotiations for the current teacher contract, the Board of Education sought to end or reduce provisions for sabbatical leaves. The Board did not succeed in taking sabbaticals away, but it did succeed in making some modifications it wanted. Having agreed to continue sabbaticals, the Board soon decided, nonetheless, to recall teachers from their sabbatical leaves—even though these leaves had been granted under the previous contract and even though no new contract provision would permit the Board to do this.

In a more primitive system of labor relations, the union might have taken immediate and direct action. It did not. Instead the UFT took a grievance on December 3. On December 15, the union's case was heard by the representative of the school Chancellor. The UFT asked that the case go immediately to an impartial arbitrator, but the Chancellor's representative said, "No. You can't go to an arbitrator because we haven't actually cancelled leaves yet."

A few days later, the Board publicly announced that sabbatical leaves would be cancelled. On December 18, the UFT wrote to the Chancellor saying that since cancellation notices "are now being written, we again request immediate arbitration of this dispute. . . . It is . . . in the interest of both the Board and the union to seek the speediest possible determination of this dispute by the method mandated in our contract for resolving contract interpretations—arbitration. . . . We are prepared to proceed to arbitration next week. We await your immediate response."

The Board stalled and refused to move toward arbitration, and the union was forced to go into court. We asked the court to stay the action of the Board on sabbaticals pending the arbitration result. The Board and the City Corporation Counsel were slow in submitting their court responses and still refuse to go to arbitration. It is now clear that the Board will seek to delay the arbitration until after it is too late—after the February 1 date when hundreds of teachers have been ordered to return and hundreds now teaching are displaced by the returnees.

If the Board continues on this course, it will be the saddest day in the history of our schools. Agitation and strife will become the order of the day, and the resentment of teachers will have great impact. Why is the Board refusing to go to arbitration in time to get a binding decision by February 1? The Board knows it will lose the case. Its refusal is proof that it seeks to deny justice by delaying it.

But there is still time. Time for the Board to do what is right. Time for Mayor Beame to speak out, as his predecessor did not, on an issue of due process. Time for the media to be heard—not for or against sabbaticals but to support the principle that labor disputes under a contract be resolved by arbitration and not by direct conflict.

Our schools and our city have a stake in the outcome.

"The Voice of the Teacher," a UFT-sponsored radio program with Albert Shanker as moderator, begins tomorrow night live over WEVD (1330 AM, 97.9 FM) from 10 to 11 p.m. Tune in tomorrow and every Monday night.

Knowing film and video tape can help the best teacher communicate better.

No matter what subject you teach—art, history, English; or whether you're a school principal or librarian, the teaching tools of the seventies are film and video tape. At The School of Visual Arts we believe a working knowledge of these valuable tools can bring an entirely new perspective to your curriculum. That's why we created a special program for teachers to help them gain the fundamentals of video tape and film for school and classroom use. Our convenient evening classes provide an opportunity for you to meet informally with people who share some of the same ideas and interests.

For more information on our special evening program for teachers, call or write: The School of Visual Arts, 209 East 23rd Street, New York, N.Y. 10010, (212) 679-7350.

The C.W. Post Weekend College

YOU'VE MADE THE MOST OF OUR GREAT IDEA!

The popularity of our Weekend College is ample proof that you like the idea of being able to attend classes on weekends. But the fact is... we've come a long way from offering just classes on weekends.

94th, Second Session

The 94th Congress returns for its second session this week with the legislative outlook heavily overcast by political clouds.

President Ford is not only seeking election in his own right but, because of former Governor Reagan's candidacy, he feels himself under pressure to prove his credentials as a conservative. At the same time, several of the most influential Democrats in the Senate are either active or potential candidates for their party's nomination.

Under these election-year circumstances, it will be more than ordinarily difficult for a Republican President and a Democratic Congress to maintain a reasonable give-and-take spirit, which is essential if major legislation is to be worked out when the two branches of government are under divided control.

Yet critical issues in such areas as energy, the environment and transportation have to be acted on in this Congress. Questions regarding the conduct of foreign policy and of the intelligence agencies cannot be evaded. They are certain to continue to generate tension between the White House and Capitol Hill.

With the pace of recovery from the recession still uncertain, economic issues probably will provoke the most heated partisan debate. Too much competitive rhetoric and too many positions adopted for electoral effect are likely as Mr. Ford and the opposition Democrats both try to demonstrate that they can hold down the budget and be socially compassionate as well.

This highly politicized battle of the budget will open when the President submits his figures for the new fiscal year. The next battle will be fought when Congress tries to override Mr. Ford's veto of the bill appropriating money for the Departments of Labor and of H.E.W. for the current fiscal year.

Tax reform remains a highly charged issue. The House last session passed a milk-and-water version of a tax reform. Given the propensities of the bipartisan majority of the Senate Finance Committee there is a high risk that even that feeble measure may be converted into a bill creating new or larger loopholes for favored corporations. Given also the wide gulf between the conservative views of the Ford Administration and the liberal views of many Democrats in Congress, consensus on a veto-proof tax reform bill of major scope is unattainable.

Unless and until the White House changes hands and a new President gives the reformers effective leadership, tax reform is going to proceed one small step at a time, if it proceeds at all.

Important as it is for the Federal Government to economize on all its routine operations, this year's record-breaking peacetime deficit is due in large part to the recession. If the economy could continue a vigorous recovery, that would do more than either President or Congress can immediately accomplish in reducing the deficit. Recovery would mean higher tax revenues and smaller payments for unemployment compensation, food stamps and welfare. The only real way to win the battle of the budget is to achieve the right mix of economic policies.

Public TV Channels

Next on the broadcasting spectrum are the "drop-ins"—new channels placed on those blank or snowy unused spots on the regular television dial. The insertion of such stations—without interfering with the signals already received—opens more opportunities for educational and community programming.

This exciting new technological breakthrough, supported by the Federal Office of Telecommunications Policy and the public-service-oriented communications office of the United Church of Christ, could expand noncommercial TV to many unserved communities, especially in rural areas, to minority groups and independents who have not had access to program participation, and to neighborhoods in large metropolitan areas. All this could encourage more competition—and more choice—on public and commercial channels.

The Corporation for Public Broadcasting has proposed that the Federal Communications Commission allocate this valuable space on the dial for noncommercial use. By adding some two hundred additional stations around the country, the F.C.C. could help to "drop in" more informational and educational broadcasting where it is now lacking. It is comparable to adding more newspapers and magazines of local origin to neighborhoods and towns without denying space for existing and accepted publications. This would be public service for the public spectrum.

Banks With Problems

The question of immediate concern to most people following the sensationalized disclosure that New York's two largest banks were on the "problem" list of the Comptroller of the Currency, has doubtless been: "Are these banks in danger of failing?" The answer is "no."

The Comptroller, James E. Smith, has firmly stated that the two banks, First National City and Chase Manhattan, "continue to be among the soundest banking institutions in the world." The crucial point is that their earnings are substantial, and their capital has not been impaired, despite the heavy loan losses these two banks—and many others—have incurred.

Those losses are due to a host of factors in the past few years: the overbuilding of condominiums and the collapse of many real-estate trusts; the rush for extra tanker capacity and the subsequent oversupply of tankers; the bankruptcy of a major retail chain and many other businesses due to the slump; the fiscal crisis of New York City and New York State, and the deterioration of the quality of their obligations, which city banks bought heavily; the boom and then the bust in world commodity prices, which has jeopardized some of the huge loans that the major banks have made to developing countries to cover their balance-of-payments deficits.

Some of the most important of the banks added to their troubles by adopting an overly aggressive policy in which the race for growth in earnings led them incautiously to overextend themselves.

The "real news," as Comptroller Smith has said, is that the banks came out of 1975 as well as they did. That was due in large measure to the reforms of the banking system during the Great Depression.

Confidence in the banks is no longer the fragile reed it once was; despite the deep slump and the sharp drop in the values of bank securities in the stock market, there have been no runs on the banks. And despite the recent disclosure of the high proportion of questionable loans in the portfolios of the two major New York banks, and the likelihood that many other banks are in a similar position, there are not likely to be any runs now. It would be utterly irrational if there were, for depositors are protected by Federal insurance.

However, investors in bank securities are not; and there seems no longer any valid reason—if there ever was—why the banks should be exempt from full disclosure of information to the public, as is required of nonbanking corporations under the securities acts. Full disclosure would not only help to protect direct investors in bank securities but also the community at large, in which banking plays so vital a role.

Fiddling and Fire

The United Nations Security Council is bemused by discordant fiddling while fundamental forces within the Arab world move perilously close to a major conflagration. The hews from Lebanon has taken an extremely ominous turn, as armed elements sympathetic to the country's Christian minority turn their hostility against the theoretically neutral Palestinian "refugees." It is in Lebanon, far more than at the United Nations, where the future of the Palestine Liberation Organization is apparently being decided.

It seems futile at this distance to pass judgment on who has provoked whom in these recent days of murderous combat in and around Beirut. What is evident is that main forces of the P.L.O. have become inextricably engaged in what had been, for nearly nine months an internal Lebanese struggle.

Militias representing Lebanon's Christian and Moslem sects have grown increasingly undisciplined in their vengeful assaults, each upon the others, with the collapse of truce after truce. Both the Lebanese armed forces, which are dominated by Christian leadership, and the P.L.O. forces, more sympathetic to the leftist Moslems, have attempted to hold themselves aloof—with diminishing success. The ability of P.L.O. leader Yasir Arafat to continue the mediatory role which he had performed earlier has faded in recent days; his own Palestinian forces have broken discipline, either out of impatience and concern for the fate of Lebanese Moslems or in response to alleged provocations from rampant Christian units.

In such circumstances, the tedious debate at the United Nations over whether the world should acknowledge Palestinian "rights" or merely their "interests" seems unreal to the point of irrelevance. The United States, committed by Secretary of State Kissinger to concert its position with Israel on this issue, is balking at any reference to "rights"; even an innocuous recognition of Palestinian "interests," for all the self-evident nature of it, is enough to raise Israeli ire.

For its part, the P.L.O. is showing no sign of heeding the advice of more moderate Arab diplomats, who understand that until the Palestinian spokesmen move toward some recognition of Israeli legitimacy, in parallel to their own, they stand no chance of acquiring a meaningful role in negotiations for a settlement.

The corridors and chambers of the United Nations are afloat in code words and abstractions, while the Palestinian reality is under severe challenge in the streets and suburbs of Beirut. The survival and viability both of the P.L.O. and of Lebanon are at issue. The provocations now taking their toll in Lebanese and Palestinian blood pose a far greater threat to the security of the Arab world—and to the maintenance of peace in the Middle East—than any of the hollow diplomatic maneuverings evident so far in New York.

The Winter Trees

The winter trees, the hardwoods which made such a vivid leaf display in October, now stand stripped to their essentials, in bare bones as it were, and one can see the source of their graceful summer shapes. That elm against the sky, one of the fortunate few not yet stricken by the fiendish blight, is not really a gigantic feather-duster. Its sturdy trunk divides some distance from the ground, then divides again and again, widening like an inverted cone.

That scarlet oak, two feet through at the butt, has a trunk the eye can follow to the very tip of the tree. But its branches start not ten feet from the ground and they reach toward the horizon, not the sky as the elm's do. Here is a tree as broad as it is tall, and rounded even in winter like a great dome.

The ash, white, black or red, is essentially a tapering trunk with whorls of lesser limbs, a pole with slender branches quite unlike last summer's svelte and graceful full-leafed tree. The maples tend to branch as the oaks do but with more lift and less spread. Sycamores shine as though perpetually frost-patched, and they divide like the elm and branch like the maple. The sour gum is a central stem with a hopeless tangle of branches crisscrossed on each other.

But of all, perhaps the most beautiful against the winter sky is the flowering dogwood with its horizontal limbs that turn skyward at their tips and form a lacy pattern. The dogwood is a picture tree, summer or winter.

U.S. Africa Policy: The Unheeded Reality

To the Editor:

Your Jan. 6 editorial "Next Steps on Angola" prompts me to observe that we have seldom attempted to formulate any policy toward Africa with the Africans in mind. Our primary concern has been to support our European allies in their dealings with Africa.

The problem is that the African reality contradicts our European concern. Our support of France in Africa did not stop the independence of Guinea and the subsequent independence of French Guiana. Our support of the Belgians in the Congo led inexorably to bringing the cold war to Africa. Our support of the Portuguese in Africa in order to keep our bases in the Azores contributed to the overthrow of the Portuguese Government itself by troops radicalized by fighting in Africa. And our failure to take a hard look at the realities of southern Africa has probably contributed more than most people are presently willing to realize to our debacle in Angola.

Does the Secretary of State really believe that he is serving the long-term interests of the people in Namibia and South Africa by talking about "Communism" or "Russian" influence in Africa? Both the Secretary and his U.N. Ambassador ought to have learned by now that, until African nationalism has run its course, other ideologies will not find fertile ground. One need only recall past predictions that Russia would dominate Ghana, Guinea, Congo (Zaire), Nigeria, Egypt, Somalia and Guinea-Bissau.

The United States itself would be better served if our people attempted to look Africa full in the face and not be alarmed if we see reflected the view of ourselves shaped by centuries of white arrogance and domination. Moyoibhan's rage at members of the third and fourth worlds might even be therapeutic if it convinces our people that they are dealing with a new reality.

The African states may be poor, their political cultures still inchoate (one must be careful here, noting the absolute chaos in Italy, the heir of Rome, and the present confusion among the descendants of the ancient Greek democrats). But, thanks in part to the United Nations, they do have international sovereignty.

Thus, in order to deal effectively with them, our policy-makers should recognize their existence. While our Secretary of State engages in shuttle diplomacy in the Middle East, pays ceremonial visits to the Far East, goes to Europe for working sessions with NATO and has graced Latin America by his presence, he has not taken the time to visit even such major African states as Nigeria and Zaire.

Everyone would be well served if the United States were to develop a coherent policy for Africa based upon the primacy of our relations with that continent. Our very silence has been taken for a lack of interest and, worst of all, has led to a feeling that we are still not prepared to accept Africa's independence.

To Save Alaska's Wolves

To the Editor:

The Alaskan plan to exterminate wolves from large areas of their natural environment deserves comment.

The plan has been called an "experiment." That is hypocrisy designed to placate opinion on the other 49 states. It is clear that there is no need for another "experiment" in wolf extermination. We've had many. When wolves were exterminated in the Central Plateau of British Columbia, prey animals (like moose) overpopulated the area and died of starvation.

A second part of the plan calls for controlling (i.e., killing) a certain number of wolves in other geographic areas in order to keep the wolf population down. Again, there is no need for this "experiment." It was tried for sixty years in Algonquin Park in Canada. When they stopped killing wolves in Algonquin, the wolf population did not grow. It stayed in natural balance with its food supply.

No doubt these facts are known to the proper authorities in Alaska. But wolves don't vote, and hunters do. I hope that an effective protest can be raised against this assault on the natural world.

A Bicentennial Thought

To the Editor:

It seems to this observer as if our Bicentennial is being used as an excuse to promote business and profits rather than to celebrate the establishment of our political heritage. Our political framework has been severely tested during recent years. The ideas of democracy are being challenged abroad as most nations struggle to develop their economic and political foundations. It is an appropriate time therefore to rededicate ourselves to the ideas which have shaped this nation and given it strength.

For example, we might explore ways to increase citizen involvement in our political processes as called for by recent legislation, to make government institutions more responsive, to give voice to individuals and groups who may be deprived, to strengthen the capacities of our citizens and institutions to guard against the threats to our liberties of recent years.

In short, the Bicentennial should be used to re-examine and strengthen our framework rather than to serve selfish interests.

Social Security: 'The Major Inequity'

To the Editor:

In recent years much attention has been given to the plight of senior citizens trying to live on small incomes, but the greatest injustice to them appears to go virtually unnoticed.

I refer to the heavy penalties imposed on the recipients (under age 72) of Social Security benefits who need to earn additional income. Any earned income over $210 ($230 in 1976) results in the loss of $1 in benefits for each $2 earned in excess of the minimum per month. Thus, an individual who obtains employment at $600 per month in 1976 would lose $185 in benefits, or $2,220 annually, effectively increasing his gross income by only $4,980.

To add insult to injury, the loss of nontaxable benefits is replaced by taxable income, as he is taxed on total earnings of $7,200. Also, this amount is subject to a S. S. tax of 5.85 percent, or 7.9 percent if self-employed. While the S.S. tax will increase future benefits, it takes about five years to recover each year's tax from the increase in benefits, and if he continues to work until age 72, the chances of full recovery of all additional S.S. taxes are very small.

The total effect is that the "Government take" on a gross earned income of $6,000 is at least 40 percent, depending on the number of tax exemptions, etc. If he had earned $730 per month, thereby losing all monthly benefits of, say, $250, the "Government take" would be almost 50 percent. The percentage would increase ad nauseam as income and S.S. benefits increase.

Citizens aged 72 and over are not subjected to such penalties. The question arises therefore: Why the age discrimination? Answer: "Since very few people work at that age and thereafter, the Federal Government gains nothing."

I have written to the chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, recommending that the major inequity (loss of benefits) be eliminated, or alternatively that any loss of benefits be allowed as a reduction of gross income, or as a business expense if self-employed, for income tax purposes. These benefits have been purchased by many years of contributions and it is a gross injustice to reduce them. The I.R.S. would disallow any company contributions to a pension plan which contained such a provision.

Reagan and the Budget

To the Editor:

Before the growing snows abuse gathers more momentum, pause to consider the common of Ronald Reagan's proposal of the Federal budget by $81.3 billion.

Presumably most of us agree Federal Government is not a Claus; it has no workshop when elves can magically manufacture wealth. Nor is it a bank, when money it takes out of each pocket grows, for the Government pays no interest for the money. In the last analysis, the Federal Government can only give what it takes from us.

The fiscal federalism of Richard and his successor, Gerald, confiscates our money and puts it in Washington. After the "expensive" Washington have decided what with our money, the remainder is back to localities or to us in the form of a tax dividend.

Does this scheme make sense? It makes sense to send our money where it is spent, not to us, minus the additional tax on the money. Does it make sense to spend but collected only to be sent to us, minus the additional tax on the money? Does it make sense to spend but collected only to be sent to us, minus the additional tax on the money? Does it make sense to spend but collected only to be sent to us, minus the additional tax on the money?

Simply put, Ronald Reagan's proposal is not to eliminate needs but to eliminate the man, i.e., the Federal Government, when those services can be provided more effectively and wisely provided local level. The real question is: Does it make sense to spend but collected only to be sent to us, minus the additional tax on the money?

Finally, despite what some Ford camp would have us believe, Ford does not "want elderly thrown out in the snow." His representations are unfair and false, and they are not in the interests of this country, which only benefit from an open and discussion of Mr. Reagan's proposal.

New River Reflection

To the Editor:

I have followed with interest Appalachian Power Company's Ridge Power Project from its inception.

My interest grew when in 1962 the Interior Department rejected to the granting of a permit. Part of my interest is from the fact that there is a "flood control" aspect. (Isn't lovely contradiction in terms?)

Included with the application original project was a request for palachian Power to install a dam at Bluestone Dam at Hinton (W. Va.) a dam that became operational in 1966 and probably has lost much capacity to 27 years of silting. In 1966 the Interior Department recommended enlarging the project "low flow augmentation" to away the pollution of the huge coal plants in the Kanawha Valley Charleston. (Isn't that a fast way to think of a river?)

There has been considerable concern on the part of lovers of the now unspoiled and in many ways a noble river—said to be second to the Nile—to get it "protected."

Bureau of Outdoor Recreation representatives have encouraged ponents of protection to believe considerable demonstration of it might help—zoning the immediate area against unsightly prizes. Two of the three through which New River flows state have taken this step.

However, the Appalachian Company has invested money prestige in the project. The oil is being closely watched by utility companies, anxious to whether Federal protection of ways will prove an effective way in the hands of environmentalists.

This seems to me an excellent whether a river may be donated privately owned company to be (especially if pollution-dilution means a tacit part of the plan) a company for profit, to the thousands of people who look to river for recreation, sport, sustenance who feel that the river is part of their life.

West Virginia, Virginia and Carolina are part of the New River vice versa, even if some politicians are not aware of this.

In Appeal To the Networks

By James Reston

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17—After all the Vietnam and Watergate talk, the need for reform in Presidential elections—even after some useful over-campaign financing and donor procedures—the preliminary results in the primary election still sound like communique's battlefield.

There is very little in all these gringos and simplistic slogans on daily news reports from the networks that can help a puzzled voter understand the central issues of the campaign. We are beginning, vaguely, to guess "Ronnie," "Jimmy," "Mo" and "Coop," but while they tour the election states exhausting themselves and their meager audiences in a dozen "speeches" a day, they as a whole haven't the faintest idea what sort of characters they really are.

Can we not, then, finally in this annual election year, have at least a fair and honest series of discussions on national television by the candidates and potential candidates on questions that will affect the lives of the American people in the four or eight years?

Obviously will not get a national or even regional primaries, but we do have national television, and plenty of prize money, and if "Meet the Press" and "Face the Nation" can get the candidates to play catch-as-catch-can on the football games, presumably they can organize a really thoughtful series of discussions on the major issues of the campaign.

There are some fundamental issues around the edges of these pre-election exhibitions in New York, Florida, Iowa, and other leading camps: increasingly powerful Federal agencies really the enemy of the citizen and social well-being of the country. Sometimes it has obviously succeeded both in domestic and foreign policy, but where and what are the remedies? And of increasingly powerful unions and multinational corporations at home, and centrally directed economies and cartels. Is it really reasonable to suppose we will have less rather than more control in the next decade that the states will match the Government's record of social over the last two generations? Are obviously questions on serious men and women can—and they are being seriously by many private individuals in all over America, but the candidates in the Presidential campaign.

are hunting delegates and voters. The two major parties are the debate because they speak candidates are divided on voters or have no answers. But voters citizens and the private press, radio and television among others, need not be in the face of this spectacle. In this preliminary phase campaign, it may still be to bring some common public to bear on this present incoherent process. candidates, if they are pressed enough by the responsible voters vote institutions of the nation, refuse to discuss the pressing issues of the coming years. Most are complaining anyway that they can't get a national audience and welcome it.

could not, if asked, refuse to their financial and medical records; to indicate their preference for Vice President—a critical issue after Spiro Agnew and Thurgood Marshall in 1972, especially since the candidates in '76 are now in their sixties—and even to indicate if they would support an issue in this early phase of the campaign is not whether the people like it or not—but that they don't like it at all—except the superficially slick of the old political networks, reaching a national audience have a special responsibility. They have the information and the informed and inquiring to bring the main political issues and characters into every part of the land, but this requires a formula for inquiry, and new, generous allocation of time.

difficult and complex questions be explored by a number of reporters in a hurry. It takes at least one or two or at most two prepared reporters to question candidates, with the utmost care, in order to get at the quality of minds and characters of these who hope to lead us into the future.

The Paralysis of Power

John-Pierre Lefevre/Sydney

By Ernest W. Lefevre

WASHINGTON—Taking advantage of American confusion over its peace-keeping role in the third world and its creeping policy paralysis induced by breast-beating on Capitol Hill and in the media, the Soviet Union has launched a massive military effort in Angola, presumably to transform that strategically located and mineral-rich country into a Cuba-style client state.

Moscow's intervention in Angola is far larger and more brazen than any of its earlier and only partially successful attempts to establish beachheads in a dozen other African states, including Nigeria, Zaire, the Congo, Guinea, Ghana, Mali, and Somalia. The Soviet Union has dispatched a political mercenary force of 7,500 heavily armed Cubans to impose its will on Angola. The 150,000 tons of arms include automatic weapons, armored vehicles, mortars, rockets, antiaircraft guns, MIG jet fighters, and ground-to-air missiles.

The Soviet military action has nothing to do with "national liberation." Angola was liberated from Portugal last Nov. 11. It has a great deal to do with what U.N. Ambassador Daniel Patrick Moynihan has aptly called Soviet colonialism. Moscow has already established military port facilities in Somalia and its navy uses the ports of Conakry on the Atlantic and Dar es Salaam on the Indian Ocean. Newly independent Mozambique has a Marxist regime. If Angola should fall under Soviet influence, Moscow would be in a position to deny Western military and possibly commercial access to several important seaports in southern Africa.

For their own security and economic reasons, the Presidents of two neighboring states, Mobutu Sese Seko of Zaire and Kenneth Kaunda of Zambia, are strongly opposed to Soviet penetration into Angola. At the recent Organization of African Unity summit meeting in Addis Ababa, they advocated that the three Angolan factions be permitted to settle the question of contested sovereignty without external military intervention. This, as it happens, is also the position of the United States and South Africa. The O.A.U. summit adjourned without acting on Angola.

But the Soviets apparently plan to continue their conquest through their Cuban proxies, determined not to repeat the mistakes they made in Chile where they also worked closely with the Cubans in attempting to further radicalize President Salvador Allende's Marxist regime, which came in with 36.5 percent of the vote. In their postmortems on the failure of the unpopular Allende Government, the Leninist logicians condemned it for not taking earlier and more drastic action, including military force, to consolidate its minority position. Consequently, Angola is not the first hot spot to be further enflamed by Moscow-dispatched mercenaries. Cuban intelligence agents and military men have been used to train, lead, or otherwise support terrorist and other insurgent groups in a dozen countries from Chile to Canada (Quebec Liberation Front) and from the Middle East (the Palestine Liberation Organization) to Zaire. The Cubans are mercenaries because Moscow is subsidizing the Castro regime to the tune of about $2 billion a day.

Responding to the Soviet-Cuban intervention in Angola, President Ford and Secretary of State Kissinger have said that if it persists it may jeopardize detente, that many splintered concept that so easily lends itself to obfuscation. The Administration has also provided some small material aid to the two Angolan factions seeking to build a moderate government prepared to have mutually beneficial diplomatic and economic relations with the West. This modest assistance was vetoed last month by the U.S. Senate in a mood of self-castigation, an action labeled by President Ford as "a deep tragedy."

But perhaps the tragedy should not be laid wholly at the door of Congress. Has the President ever made it clear to the American people what is really at stake in Angola? Is Angola not one more testing ground between two radically different ways of organizing society—one emphasizing self-determination and consent and the other elite dictatorship and coercion? What about the "mischief-making potential of a Soviet Angola in Africa?"

America is not the policeman of the world. We have no mandate to impose our democratic institutions on other peoples. But we do have a responsibility, commensurate with our power and consistent with our interests, to resist the forcible imposition of totalitarian power, as we have done in the past in Europe and Korea.

If detente has any substance, Angola is certainly a test case. No American troops are needed. Why does not Mr. Ford, hopefully with the support of Congress, inform Mr. Brezhnev that U.S. grain shipments to the Soviet Union will be suspended and the strategic arms limitations talks broken off until Moscow withdraws its Cuban expeditionary force from Angola?

This would take courage in these troubled times when the earlier "illusion of American omnipotence" is giving way to an even more dangerous malady—the paralysis of power.

Back in the Gutter

By Tom Wicker

George Wallace has lapsed for the first time in years into his true gutter style. At a news conference in Montgomery the other day, he cast off the respectable robes in which too many politicians and too much of the national press have tried to drape him and came out snarling and kicking like the alley fighter he is.

The country was being run, he charged, by "thugs and Federal judges." The sin of the latter was that they—or at least Federal Judge Frank M. Johnson Jr. of Alabama—wanted "to create a hotel atmosphere" in Alabama's prisons. Furthermore, said Mr. Wallace with unerring political aim, these judges paid "no attention . . . to the victims of crime"; they only wanted to make common citizens "foot the bill to make the criminal comfortable."

All in all, said Alabama's perennial Governor and chronic Presidential campaigner, another good vote for George Wallace was needed so that it "might give a political barbed wire enema to some of the Federal judges in this country."

What evoked such pointed imagery from the suave George Wallace the country has recently been seeing? A devastating finding by Judge Johnson that the overcrowding, dilapidation, filth, "rampant violence and jungle atmosphere" of Alabama prisons "violated any current judicial definition of cruel and unusual punishment" and that the state had to undertake forthwith an expensive program to correct these "massive constitutional infirmities" in its prison system.

As if in anticipation of Mr. Wallace's angry response, Judge Johnson said he acted "with a recognition that prisoners are not to be coddled, and prisons are not to be operated as hotels or country clubs." But this, he said, did not mean that the state could "operate prison facilities that are barbaric and inhumane."

Just a few of Judge Johnson's findings—many of them conceded by state prison authorities, all supported by the evidence in three class-action suits against Mr. Wallace and other state officials—will convey a sense of the horror of Alabama prisons:

Fountain prison, designed for 632 men, housed over 1,100 at the time of the trial, but the three other main institutions suffered conditions almost as bad—"bunks . . . packed together so closely that there is no walking space between them . . . mattresses spread on floors in hallways and next to urinals."

In these dilapidated facilities, "windows are broken and unscrubbed, creating a serious problem with mosquitoes and flies. Old and filthy cotton mattresses lead to the spread of contagious diseases and body lice. Nearly all inmates' living quarters are inadequately heated and ventilated. The electrical systems are totally inadequate, exposed wiring poses a constant danger to the inmates, and insufficient lighting results in eye strain and fatigue. In general, Alabama's penal institutions are filthy . . . overrun with roaches, flies, mosquitoes and other vermin. . . . In one area at Draper, housing well over 200 men, there is one functioning toilet. . . . Food services are unsanitary, the food itself "unappetizing and unwholesome" and utensils are so poorly provided that "some inmates drink from used tin cans." Garbage "sits in large open drums throughout the dining halls."

Virtually no rehabilitation, job training, educational or recreational programs, "woefully inadequate" mental health services, serious understaffing—383 guards against an estimated head of 692—contribute to the fact that "robbery, rape, extortion, theft and assault are everyday occurrences."

in the prison population, some of whom voluntarily subject themselves to isolation cells for protection, and almost all of whom carry some kind of weapon.

All these and other deficiencies were findings of fact by Judge Johnson, but Governor Wallace nevertheless is appealing the judge's order for improvements in prison conditions, and insisted at his news conference that "there has been no intentional neglect of prisons in Alabama." That was not the view of L. B. Sullivan, the head of the state's prison system until he resigned some months ago, charging that he could not get sufficient help from the state. And Judge Johnson, noting that Alabama's defense in the trials had been that the Legislature would not provide adequate funds for the prisons, wrote in his opinion: "A state is not at liberty to afford its citizens only those constitutional rights which fit comfortably within its budget."

Anyway, there is nothing on the record to show that George Wallace has ever made the slightest effort to win funding for improved prison conditions—and either he or his first wife, Mrs. Lurleen Wallace, has occupied the Alabama governor's office since January, 1963, except for the years 1968 and 1969. If Alabama's prisons are unconstitutionally "barbaric and inhumane," no one is more responsible than George Corley Wallace—which embarrassing fact is why the urbane Presidential candidate so suddenly reverted to the gutter.

Europe's Restive Tribes

By C. L. Sulzberger

PARIS—It is distressing to return from Africa and find the cultivated old continent of Europe subsiding into its own form of tribalism just as new African governments make concerted efforts to curb the power of tribes and subordinate them to the greater concept of the nation-state.

Most informed persons are aware of the difficulty posed by tribal traditions to Africa's experiment with modern political nationalism. Several wars at least tangentially pertaining to this issue have already been fought: the Katanga insurrection in Zaire, Nigeria's Biafra conflict; the Sudan civil war; the Chad guerrilla uprising; Eritrea's struggle against Ethiopia.

On the whole, the young African states have made impressive headway in establishing the priority interests of central governments. They tend to regard tribal claims in a way similar to that assumed by medieval European rulers toward overambitious feudal fiefdoms.

In the name of modern nationhood and in order to avoid tribalism's splitting tendencies, several African lands have proclaimed European tongues as their official languages: English in Zambia, French in Gabon, Portuguese in Mozambique, etc.

Yet contemporaneous with this phenomenon is a trend in Europe to break up into even smaller segments, both geographic and linguistic, nations already shrunken on the scale of influence by the loss of former empires. One cannot forget that several countries threatened by such neo-tribalism were great powers within relatively recent times.

This is true for Britain where arguments over "devoolution" versus local "nationalism" rage in non-English sections of the United Kingdom including Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. It is not merely a matter of reviving relatively little-used languages like Gaelic and Welsh but of actually shifting major authority including title to mineral wealth into regional hands.

Likewise this is true for Belgium, which once possessed a rich empire, where bitter arguments between French-speaking Walloons and Flemish-speaking Flanders frequently threaten to paralyze governance. Or for Spain, where Catalonian and Basque autonomists work to diminish Madrid's central authority. Even in France, where Bretons and Bretons add political overtones to cultural and linguistic movements.

reducing the remnants of their own strength the moment history, in the form of an anticolonial era, deprived them of previous international grandeur.

There is no logical reason that a Scotland which was proud to be considered part of the British Empire's heart when the sun never set on it, from Calcutta to Capetown, is now increasingly eager to disengage from what is left of that grand tradition on an offshore European island. Nor for Bretons, who gave so much energy and genius to a French navy that linked the metropole to Algeria and Gabon, now to agitate for a version of mini-separation.

The philosophy of tribalism, either African or European, is understandable, viewed against mankind's record of seeking individuality when this is not inconsistent with security. Yet as anti-tribalism is now expressed by almost all member states of the Organization of African Unity, it is a logical and forward-looking human step.

Such cannot be said for European tribalism, however, despite its romantic background in terms of Celtic poetry, Catalonian history or the extraordinary partly vital obscurity of the Basques. For European tribalism is gaining vigor at precisely the moment when the movement for European unity is losing vigor.

The concept of "Europe" with its own political machinery, currency and military defenses is little advanced over fifteen years ago. And separatist trends within some of its major components scarcely harmonized with the thought of a viable European Community.

Of course, the contemporary nation where tribalism is most dangerously latent is Russia. The U.S.S.R. contains the seeds of its own potential destruction in the form of Ukrainian, Baltic, Armenian, Georgian, Turkic, Kirghiz, Uzbek and Kazakh nationalisms.

If ever permitted to develop unchecked, these would tear apart the great conglomeration ruled from Moscow. But, despite similar movements on a miniature scale among Europe's former imperial powers, there is no sign of dangerous tribalism today in any corner of the Muscovite empire. The reason for this is simple: The U.S.S.R. remains strong and cemented together by a regime in the Kremlin which is resolutely determined that whatever happens to other empires or other tribal assemblages, no similar disintegrating movement will be tolerated within the disciplined Soviet system.

The Anonymous Life Insurance Company Achieves Unheard-of Success

I'm president of a life insurance company you probably never heard of. Like most of the nearly 2000 life insurance companies in the United States (all but the few that advertise nationally) Beneficial National is unknown to the general public. That's why we've taken to calling ourselves "the anonymous life insurance company."

But now the anonymous company has done something unheard-of: We've achieved two billion dollars of life insurance volume in force, before our 13th anniversary.

So far as we can tell, no other life insurance company, with the exception of Allstate, has ever come so far so fast. In fact, several fine companies have taken longer than a century to reach the two billion dollar milestone.

There are two important reasons for our unheard-of success (four, if you want to count clean living and hard work). The first is our position as "the insurance man's insurance company." In the insurance community, we're anything but anonymous, and to more than ten thousand agents and brokers, we are either the primary marketplace or one of the first alternatives for life insurance business.

The second reason for our success is the younger generation, the men and women coming of age in the 'seventies. While other people have been busy trying to characterize this generation, we've been busy insuring it. Tens of thousands of college students and recent graduates are owners of individual life insurance policies underwritten by Beneficial National. Now that we've lifted our veil of anonymity, there are a few other things you should know about us: We're one of the fewer than forty life insurance companies to be admitted to do business in all 50 states and the District of Columbia. We write all forms of protection for individuals and groups: life; health; pensions; Keogh and IRA plans; and a variety of special programs. More than 800,000 men, women and children all over the nation are insured under our various plans; if we were a city, we'd be bigger than Washington, D.C.

There's much more to our story . . . much that might be of interest to insurance agents and brokers, corporate executives and practically anybody else. For further information I invite you to contact me or one of our other officers. We'll be pleased to tell you more about the anonymous life insurance company that's rapidly making a name for itself.

By GENE L. MAEROFF

To some American teenagers, being forced to attend school is torture. They yearn to leave, but the law and society say they are supposed to continue until they reach a certain age—16, 17 or 18, depending on the laws of their states. The result is that many students become disenchanted, fail to benefit from classroom work and often get entangled in disciplinary problems.

In recent years there has been a movement toward lowering the age for compulsory schooling and making it easier for youngsters to leave, either permanently or at least for a year or two.

A new law in California, for instance, permits students 16 and 17 years old—ordinarily required by law to remain in school—to leave with their parents' permission on successful completion of an examination demonstrating proficiency in basic skills such as English and mathematics.

In Virginia, where students are legally expected to remain in school until they are 17, the Legislature is considering an experiment in 13 school districts permitting students as young as 15 to quit school permanently.

14 Is Proposed

The National Commission on the Reform of Secondary Education, established by the Charles F. Kettering Foundation, has recommended that the formal school-leaving age be dropped to 14. "If the high school is not to be a custodial institution," the report says, "the state must not force adolescents to attend. Earlier maturity—physical, sexual and intellectual—requires an option of earlier departure from the restraints of formal schools. . . . Employment laws should be rewritten to assure on-the-job training in full-time service and work."

Willard Wirtz, the former Secretary of Labor, in his new book, "The Boundless Resource," urges "the abolition of the shibboleth that everybody should 'stay in school until you're finished.' That idea has already crumbled and cracked to the point that it is now held together mostly by a combination of administrative convenience and false parental pride and concern."

Years ago children often quit school at an early age to help on farms or get jobs. There was no uniformly recognized length of time that a child should continue in school. After the turn of the century, education through high school came to be standardized at 12 grades, meaning that most youngsters would remain in school until age 18.

A major impetus for the standardization was the establishment of the so-called Carnegie unit system, that prescribed the number of years of each academic course that ought to be required for entrance into college. Another impetus was the laws against child labor. Still another was the notion of the need for universal education in a democratic society.

Ideas Rethought

Those ideas are now being rethought. It is no longer taken for granted that sitting in a classroom is the only productive and worthwhile route to adulthood. There also is greater recognition that some youngsters mature faster and have different needs than others.

Educators who are serious about lowering the compulsory age do not advocate simply freeing children to roam the streets. They want the high school to serve as a kind of broker matching early leavers with full-time jobs, internships and apprenticeships, opportunities for community service and perhaps even college-level stud-dies—despite the lack of a diploma.

One proposed approach is to award credit toward a diploma on the basis of out-of-school life experience. Another is to allow young people who drop out to return to high school when they have matured and perhaps place more value on a formal education.

The concepts are still basically in the talking stage, and the closest approach to what the reformers have in mind is the work-study plan—which does not really involve quitting school. Under this plan the students divide their school time between the classroom and a job.

Many high schools also release students for a portion of the school day to work as volunteers in hospitals, social agencies and governmental offices. The idea is to give more "relevance" to the school program and to expose the students to possible career fields.

There are many problems involved in the proposed reform. Critics point out, for example, that it is unrealistic to expect high schools to establish the elaborate system that would be needed for them to serve as job brokers. High schools already have insufficient resources to serve youngsters staying in school.

Even if a system were set up, the critics point out, young people with minimal education would be thrown into a labor market that already has high unemployment, particularly among the young and unskilled. Unemployment among out-of-school teen-agers at present is 19 percent and much more than that among black youngsters.

Moving more teen-agers into the job market also would be opposed strongly by labor unions. Walter G. Davis, education director of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations, says that letting youngsters out of school early "could be a great learning device but it is not viable today because it is really a full-employment idea."

Perhaps the strongest objection of some critics is that the proposed reform would add to the "elitism" that already exists. Today 25 percent of the nation's young people leave high school before graduation, the majority never returning to complete their formal education. If the compulsory age were lowered, these critics say, the social division between the educated and uneducated would become even more pronounced.

The late John A. Stambaugh, who served on the National Commission on the Reform of Secondary Education and dissented from the group's proposal for a 14-year-old dropout age, put it this way:

"Unless concern is taken to provide those early school-leavers with alternative forms of education and appropriate counseling once having left school, all we shall be doing is dooming

them to economic and

tional inferiority." If the trend toward easier leaving school have a productive, many educators feel, society must begin to out differently. High must be viewed as a national continuum. Its dents can climb on as will, they say, and out must be seen as ure, but as a resp educational journey determined length.

After 200 years, it's time to teach big business a few lessons about democracy.

200 years ago, a band of troublemakers we now call the Patriots started a revolution in America.

Over many of the same problems we face today:

High prices. Shortages of vital goods. Unfair taxes. Growing unemployment. Discrepancies in wealth. Corruption in government.

These were the burning issues of the 1770's! Back then, our founders pointed an accusing finger at the British government and its rich merchant friends.

Today, we at the Peoples Bicentennial Commission are pointing the finger at big business and its friends in the American government.

We believe there is nothing democratic about the way a handful of giant corporations dominate American life. From the aisles of the supermarket to the halls of Congress.

These Corporate Monarchs are so powerful they defy the laws of our society. They fix prices. Destroy our environment. Manufacture unemployment. Dodge our tax laws. Manipulate our government. And undermine foreign governments.

At PBC we think 1976 is the time for a new movement to challenge the awesome influence of big business over our lives. We know millions of Americans already agree with us.

A recent nationwide poll conducted for us by Peter D. Hart Research Associates shows 49 percent of Americans approve of such a movement.

We have been preparing for 1976 for five years. Today we have 71 PBC chapters and 20,000 supporters from every state in the union.

Hundreds of thousands of people read our literature distributed by schools, libraries, churches, civic and community groups, and bookstores. Many more are reached by our TV and radio public service messages on hundreds of stations.

All we need to become an army of new American patriots is one thing: You. Your support will help us re-acquaint Americans with the issues of 200 years ago. And it will help us conduct a campaign against corporate tyranny today. Our country needs modern-day versions of Abigail Adams and Thomas Jefferson. Declare your independence in 1976! Join us today.

Steelers Favored Over Cowboys Today in Super Bowl at Miami

Pittsburgh Aims to Keep Championship of N.F.L.

By WILLIAM N. WALLACE

MIAMI, Jan. 17—The coin to be tossed among the many captains of the Pittsburgh Steelers and Dallas Cowboys tomorrow to determine which one is to receive the kickoff is of solid gold. It is a national Bicentennial medal three inches thick, almost a pound in weight and with a cost of $4,000.

Sketches by Larry Vickers

The kickoff time is 2 P.M. and the New York television station is Channel 2.

The Steelers, who beat the Minnesota Vikings, 16-6, in last year's Super Bowl contest in New Orleans, are the favorites but their position seems to be weakening.

Jimmy (The Greek) Snyder, a noted oddsmaker, says Pittsburgh by 6 1/2. Bud Goodee, a noted Los Angeles computer analyst, has come up with a new set of figures that say Pittsburgh by merely 2.

Winning Players Receive $15,000

Among others, Carroll Rosenbloom, the owner of the Los Angeles Rams whose team was devastated by the cowboys Jan. 4 in the National Conference championship game, 37-7, likes Dallas.

A man in Fort Lauderdale the other day paid $70 for a pair of tickets that turned out to be counterfeit, the owners smugged. Fortunately, the seats were in a row that does not exist in the stadium.

staff that more than one person may show up to sit in one seat because of counterfeiters. "Additional security personnel will be on hand," said the N.F.L. announcement.

A commercial minute of television advertising can cost as much as $230,000 on the CBS sliding scale of prices and that is a record.

Even though only 80,000 can get into the stadium, an estimated 120,000 will be drawn to the Miami area by the event, which will be televised here.

A record number of press credentials, 1,735, has been issued and a record number of words (1,200,000) and pictures filed on the event.

A record number of private aircraft, about 50, is expected by late today at the Opa-Locka Airport. The commercial airlines put on 98 extra flights to bring the people here.

Low Price, the director of the Miami-Metro Tourist Bureau, said, "Super Bowl fever is the greatest single epidemic any community can hope to have."

Less enthusiastic sociologists have described the Super Bowl as America's No. 1 symbol of excess, or the No. 1 symbol of the corporate write-off.

Lincoln-Mercury has outdone them all. It has hired a cruise ship, Monarch Sun, which took off last night with 600 salesmen and their families aboard for a quick trip to Freeport in the Bahamas and back in time for the game tomorrow.

The live action will begin on television 90 minutes before the kickoff. The hint that something important is about to happen will be given by Andy Williams when he sings the National Anthem.

There will be no lack of explaining of the contest, CBS has 15 commentators ready to talk on television and two more for radio.

Unseasonably cool temperatures, ranging from 60 to 65 degrees were predicted after a cold front moved into the area.

Finally the clean-up crews will remove about 10 tons of garbage from the stadium after the game is over. That, too, is expected to be a record.

The weather didn't keep everyone away from Aqueduct yesterday, but it did force these spectators to take measures to defend themselves against the cold.

Favorite First at Aqueduct

By MICHAEL KATZ

Right Mind, a 5-year-old horse who was trained by a man who was trained by Vince Lombardi, ran to daylight yesterday and captured the $54,450 Aqueduct Handicap at the Big Arctic.

Joe Kronovich, a former linebacker on Lombardi's Green Bay Packer teams of 1958-59, trains the son of Mr. Right, whom he bought with his partner, a Providence, R.I., advertising executive, Dick Deebles.

On a day when reindeer races might have been more appropriate — the temperature at post time for the feature was 19 degrees and the frozen tundra was whipped by icy winds of more than 20 miles an hour — only five horses competed for the $32,670 first prize.

Mike Venezia, the rider aboard the General claimed foul against Ron Turcott, Right Mind's jockey, for alleged interference around the far turn, but the stewards disagreed.

Our Hero, Ogden Phipps's horse for whom Angel Cordero ended a one-week Las Vegas vacation ("not so bad, I only lost about $600"), finished third, 1 1/4 lengths behind General Beauregard and a neck in front of Hole in the Pants.

A CONGRATULATORY KISS was given to Christa Zechmeister, winner of World Cup slalom, by her West German teammate, Rosi Mittermaier, in Berchtesgaden, West Germany, yesterday. Details, Page 12.

Curbs off On Size Of Teams

By GORDON S. WHITE Jr.

ST. LOUIS, Jan. 17—The National Collegiate Athletic Association lifted its restrictions on the size of traveling and home squads in all sports today.

The change is effective immediately. Basketball teams may travel with more than 10 players and home teams may suit up more than 13, the former N.C.A.A. limits.

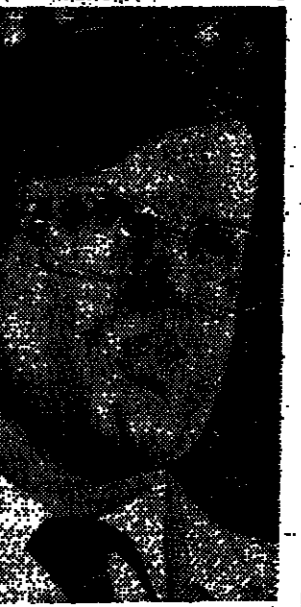

The action also nullified two lawsuits that had been brought against the N.C.A.A. restrictions, one by Alabama and the other by Bobby Knight, Indiana's basketball coach.

Some athletic conferences still have their own limitations. The Big Ten, for instance, allows only 54 for football traveling squads in league games only, but sets no home limit.

The Missouri Valley Conference has no home limits, but sets a maximum of 52 in football and 12 in basketball.

College hockey rules require a player limit of 18, plus any number of goalies for both the home and travel teams.

Other travel and home limitations abolished were: Baseball, 18 and 23; cross-country, 9 and 11; fencing, 12 and 15; golf, 6 and 8; gymnastics, 12 and 13; lacrosse, 24 and 30; skiing, 12 and 12; swimming, 18 and 23; tennis, 7 and 9; indoor track, 22 and 28; outdoor track, 27 and 34; volleyball, 12 and 15.

Rangers Befuddled By Western Rivals

By LEONARD KOPPELT

OAKLAND, Calif., Jan. 17—According to the dictionary, zenith means "the highest point, peak, summit, culmination," and nadir means "the lowest point, the time of greatest depression or dejection."

Can you reach the zenith and the nadir simultaneously? Well, the New York Rangers did last night in a 7-0 loss to the California Golden Seals. The zenith of inefficiency, they started out by outshooting the Seals, 15-4, in the first period—and managed to come out of it trailing 4-0.

From them on, the hustling young Seals simply skated rings, not to mention figure goals and a few spins, and rams around the Rangers for the rest of the evening, scoring three goals in each of the remaining periods.

Nor was there much the buyers could say. Dubois, Williams, the goalie, got run over physically a couple of times. The Rangers' first line of Phil Sperto, Rod Gilbert and Steve Vickers kept getting eaten in the puck, at almost every exchange, and was on

Knicks' Victories Silence the Critics

By SAM GOLDAPER

What a difference a few victories can make. Winning has accomplished miracles for their Knicks and their fans.

The Knicks' 8-19 won-lost record of last Dec. 12 has become a bad memory, replaced by 13 victories in the last 17 games, including Friday night's 102-90 triumph over the Kansas City Kings.

Instead, now that the Knicks have reached the balance between running and pattern offenses and their defense has returned, Holzman is coaching genius again.

Phil Jackson said John Gianelli have become defensive standouts, Holzman's platooning in the waning minutes of close games has been praised and Eddie Donovan, the general manager, is called a genius for picking up Butch Beard for the waiver price.

The Knicks returned yesterday from their six-game road trip with three straight victories and four in the six games. Frazier, back in his East Side apartment, reflected on the trip and said: "Everybody came through in different ways, and it worked out well. What a difference from the first time we made the trip."

Players May Shun Pro Bowl

Special to The New York Times

MIAMI BEACH, Jan. 17—The Pro Bowl, the National Football League's all-star game, became an endangered species today. The game is scheduled next Sunday in New Orleans, but it's conceivable the selected players may vote not to play in it.

Ed Garvey, the executive director of the N.F.L. Players Association, and Kermit Alexander, the president, raised that possibility during a news conference when the status of the N.F.L. pension plan was questioned.

Garvey said he didn't know whether or not the pension plan was still in effect. It might have died, he said, March 31, 1974, the date the owners quit contributing to the plan. "We don't know," he added.

"The Pro Bowl is the pension game," Alexander said. "The money is supposed to go to the pension plan. If there's no pension plan, why should the players play in the Pro Bowl?"

Garvey said he and Alexander would go to New Orleans Monday or Tuesday and talk to the 80 players about the game, the pension plan and other issues. He said he expected they would vote on whether or not to

Klein and Rosalie to See Super Bowl at Usual Bar

By JIMMY BRESLIN

On a chilly Sunday in 1972, my friend Klein, who was a lawyer in Queens, had another major fight with his wife, which caused him to sulk out of his house and go to his office on Queens Boulevard, across the street from the Criminal Court Building in Kew Gardens. Agitation impaired his ability to work, and he went downstairs to a bar that was crowded with people watching a football game. The only thing Klein the lawyer disliked more than football on television is a client who is innocent. Klein feels that is too much of a burden.

He was about to leave when he saw, sitting alone, a woman who looked almost exactly like his wife.

"I don't like you," Klein said to her.

"Why?"

"Because," Klein said, speaking as a lawyer.

"If you don't like me, then at least buy a drink."

Klein bought the drink. They exchanged names. The woman's name was Rosalie.

"What game is this, anyway?" Rosalie said.

"Flushing High School," Klein said.

"Did you go there?" she said.

"Sure, that's why I know who it is," Klein said.

"Then I'm rooting for Flushing High," she said. "Which team is it?"

"That one, Klein said. He pointed to the Dallas Cowboy team, which had the ball and was on its way to winning the 1972 Super Bowl over Miami.

As the day went on, the girl brushed Klein. He went for the knee like he was supposed to. And in the final moments of the Super Bowl game of 1972, Dallas was defeating Miami on television and at the bar romance was annihilating Klein the Lawyer. He took his new girlfriend's hand. He never let go.

On each Sunday afternoon since that day in 1972, Klein and Rosalie had sat in the same place at the same bar, holding hands and looking into each other's eyes. At first, to get out of the house on a Sunday, Klein would tell his wife that he was having a big secret meeting with clients in the Mafia. They would cut his throat if he ever disclosed the location of the meeting, he told his wife.

As time went on, Klein grew more brazen and began to give no excuses. And his girlfriend Rosalie began to change. Instead of looking almost like Klein's wife, she now looked exactly like Klein's wife. Finally, this year, Klein parted with his wife and took up completely with Rosalie.

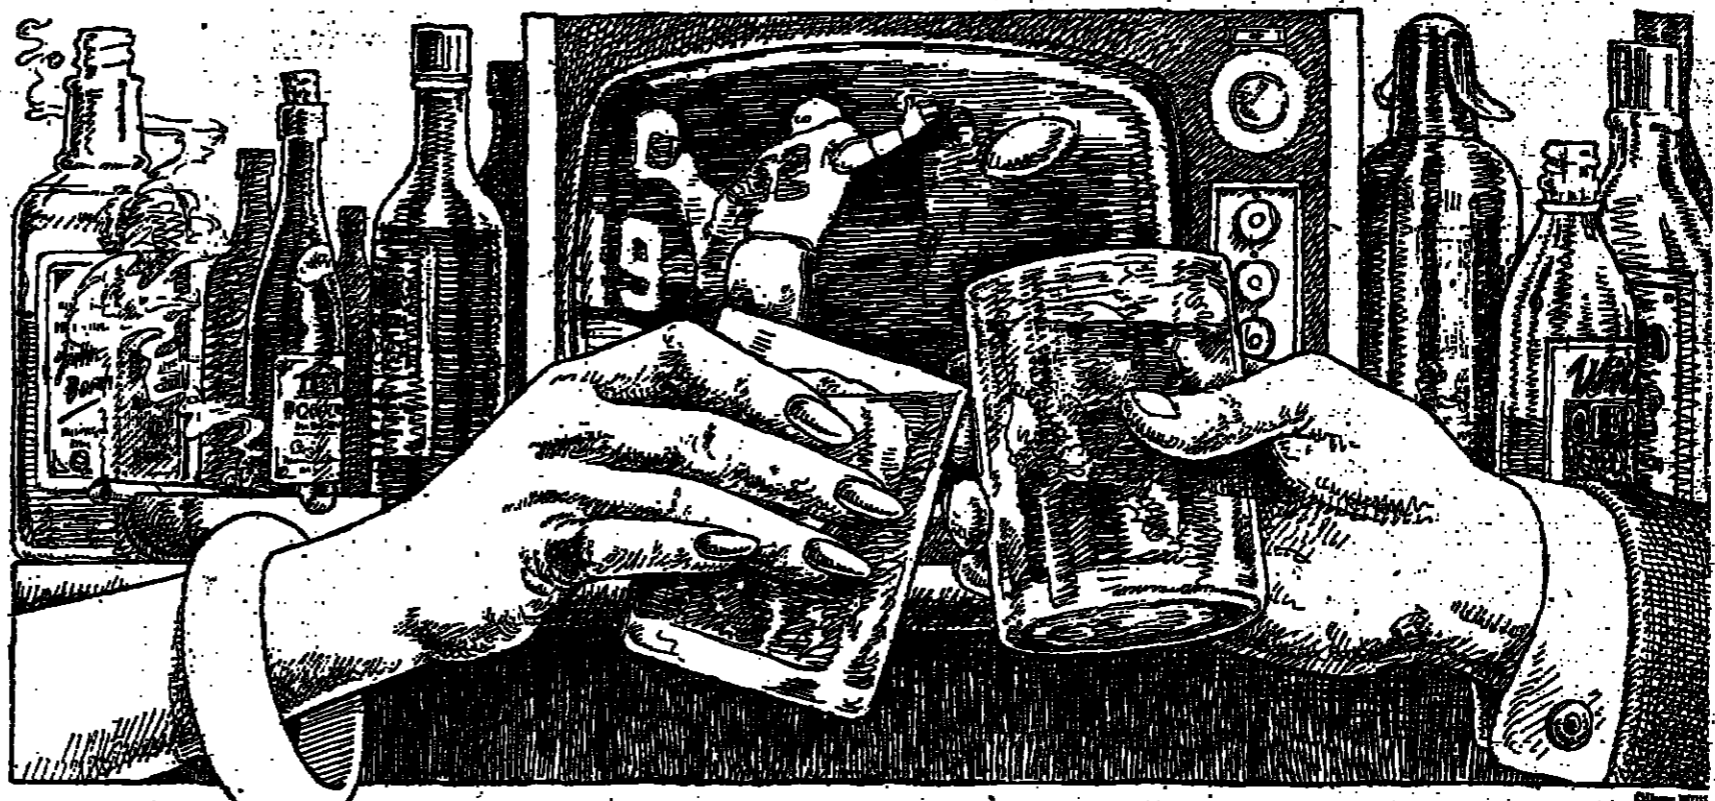

Which made many people on Queens Boulevard uneasy. Other wives, hearing the news, were beginning to ask questions about life on the Boulevard. The truth is that life on Queens Boulevard is absolutely sensational. At noontime once day there was a fire in an apartment building across from the court-house. Rushing out of the apartment building, buttoning and tucking in shirts, were lawyers, judges, prosecutors, politicians—and the undercover cops assigned to check on all the others.

And the undercover cops assigned to check on them.

"You're jamming us," Klein's friends told him. "My wife said she's coming here for lunch today. She never did that before. She's checking up on me."

Klein the Lawyer and Rosalie began to remain clear of the area during the week. But each Sunday they were in the bar on Queens Boulevard, the Part One Bar, having several drinks, holding hands and seeing nothing but each other.

Several weeks ago, in anticipation of Super Bowl X, Shelley Chevlowe, the bail bondsman who also runs the Part One Bar, installed one of these new movie screen-sized television sets. He then invited most of the people he sees all week to come around and watch the Super Bowl on the new screen. As nobody can get out on Sunday without his wife, Shelley the Bondsman planned a buffet in honor of the wives.

"I can't show up," many of the boys told Shelley. "My wife will put one foot into the place, see Klein with his girlfriend and go crazy."

"I'll tell him not to come," Shelley said. "That's easy."

It was not. "I can't help you, I'm bringing Rosalie Sunday," Klein the Lawyer said. "She says it's our anniversary. She remembers one of these teams was playing the day we met. The Cowboys or something."

"You're making everybody we know stay home," Shelley the Bondsman said.

"So let them stay home. I'm in love with my girl," Klein the Lawyer said.

So while Dallas plays the Steelers today, Klein and Rosalie will be at the Bar of the Part One, celebrating their anniversary, and not seeing one play of the game. And all the regulars have to remain at home.

Which proves once more—in the midst of all this consuming interest in a football game—that one turn of a woman's head still is stronger than anything that has happened since man got off all fours and started running off-tackle plays.

One-Time Sports Fiend, An Expert on Everything Doesn't Care Anymore

By MARC BLOOM

I will be the only man at work tomorrow not talking about today's Super Bowl game. I will not have watched The Game. I am not interested. I don't even know the names of more than a couple of players from both teams. (Years ago I chatted with Terry Bradshaw when he was a scholastic javelin champion, and even that will not provoke me to watch The Game.) If, 15 years ago, someone would have predicted this of me, I would have laughed.

As a teen-ager in the early-to-mid-sixties, I was the neighborhood sports authority. Friends called me The Encyclopedia. I went the whole route. I digested the sporting news, I catalogued newspaper box scores, I watched the games on television, listened late at night on radio and sat in the balcony at the old Garden. I was a fanatical team rooter, especially for the Dodgers (even after their Brooklyn exodus) and for Notre Dame football.

I was the one who settled arguments about Kotfux and Marichal, Russell and Chamberlain, Tittle and Van Brocklin. But my specialty—the domain of the expert's expert—involved the obscure athletes and obscure facts about them. In 1960, I could name every World Series winner from 1903 on. Duke Snider was my hero, and I still think he belongs in the Hall of Fame.

I played, too, like any city kid. Stickball and punchball and basketball were our favorites. But my passion was football, before it became fashionable.

ed long before I got rid of my Brooklyn Dodgers pennant flag. But a 15-year-old is not cognizant of them; a 25-year-old is and should be.

The media have contributed to it and tomorrow's headlines will testify to this. Life and death, it will seem, not fun and games.

Maybe I am a purist, which is not good, and my defection inviolate the influence of television upon sports. Television contracts mean high salaries, exorbitant prizes and widespread media coverage, which, in turn, fuel the public's craving for the Super Bowl and the Super Sport and, alas, the Super Game.

So what's wrong with million-dollar tournaments and banner headlines? I'm not sure, unless, as it turns out, athletic involvement in dozens of other established sporting activities do not reap similar benefits of public appreciation, recognition or financial reward.

No Place for 'Minors'

My aesthetic senses, uncultivated, they may be, are not satisfied. This is a whole world of beautiful athletic feats, in addition to the halcyon pro leagues and tours. Gymnastics, skiing, cycling, distance running, swimming, handball, speed skating to name a few, are heralded in most places outside the United States. And for good reason. They require enormous preparation, capacity and sacrifice, and our cultures recognize this. Here, though, they are "minor" sports, esoterica, to be ignored if not mocked and, won't you be so kind, abandoned in the days of austerity budgets.

It is ironic that these sports, most amateur, receive notice every four years—at Olympic time. There is a wonderful public acknowledgment that the Olympics show off the world's greatest athletes. But after the closing ceremony these athletes again slip into American oblivion.

I love sports. I am constantly awed by what some persons can do with their bodies. Maybe I just root for the underdog, which is supposed to be the American way. Why the post-amerateur, the real amateur, working day, training into the darkness, collecting ribbons but not press clippings, gaining personal, but not public approval, delaying gratification and disciplining his ego. Somehow, that seems more meaningful than Super Sunday.

If race walkers or Nordic skiers were treated like quarterbacks in our society, would I think them less appealing? I think so. That reveals my hangup not yours. But I would like the chance to be tested.

Fete Rose, Who's He?

Today, I don't think I can name more than a half-dozen professional managers. I cannot even list one player on every major league baseball team, much less compete in "Baseball Initials," my Olympics of years past. Dr. J is the only player I can identify on the Nets. I watched only a few minutes of the last World Series. I haven't seen a hockey game since Boom Boom Geoffrion was in his prime. And Fred Lynn means nothing to me. Willie McCovey? His rookie year I'll never forget.

What happened to me? Part of the change was natural: after a baseball-career-flipping adolescence, I discovered college, marriage, a family, a career, a mortgage and political awareness. I also discovered that our exalted sports heroes, like our Presidents, are really ordinary folk like you and I.

The things that drew me close to certain teams, individuals and sports—loyalty, dedication, commitment, sincerity, old-fashioned, to be sure—seemed to evaporate. The politicizing and re-mantling of some athletic venues at the expense of others gnawed at me. Much of these circumstances exist-

The Flyers and a Hero Named Shero

By ROGER KAHN

The day after his triumph—and the Flyers' 4-to-1 triumph over the Soviet Army squad was uncontestedly a triumph of coaching—Fred Shero sat in the cubicle that passes for his office in the Philadelphia Spectrum, explaining how a North American hockey team had finally beaten the champion of all the Russians.

"It isn't surprising. We didn't play that physically. It may not even be fit that complicated. We knew their style."

Shero sketched certain weaving patterns.

"They want to confuse you with this weaving. Then they want you to skate out to meet them. But there's no point. Don't skate with them. They're better-conditioned than North American athletes. Make them skate. Make them come to you. When they came, we were there."

A small smile, but no whoop of joy.

It is hard to imagine Freddie Shero whooping for three years, while establishing himself as the premier hockey coach, an extant Shero has perfected a splendid Philadelphia cool. His talk, always soft-voiced, ranges from gold-tending to Dostoyevsky, from courage to immortality to how you keep a championship hockey team from growing bored. "Call me," Shero says, with as much pride as he allows himself to show, "predictably unpretentious."

Once we discussed players drinking on the road. The conventional nonsense here suggests that, as a matter of image, you let them drink a bit, but not at the team motel.

"That's ridiculous," Shero said. "Some of these motels are miles from a bar. If the players get hit with a $7 taxi fare, on the way to a drink, you know they won't settle for one or two. They'll want their money's worth. The Flyers can drink anywhere they want, preferably at the motel."

What about contending with the press?

"Win or lose, I never close a locker room. If you're man enough to take a drink, you're man enough to meet the press."

Now in the cubicle, Shero was considering his own situation with the press. The Philadelphia Bulletin had printed a box, headlined "N.Y. Times Rips Flyers," that quoted Dave Anderson's comment that the victory "was a triumph of terror over style and could not have been more one-sided if Al Capone's mob had ambushed the Bolshoi Ballet." Someone bore in a message that Anderson wanted Shero to telephone him.

Valeri Kharlamov of the Soviet Army hockey team on the ice after a punishing check by Ed Van Impe of the Flyers last Sunday. The Russians walked off moments later in protest, but returned and lost.

Now, I suppose, I have a situation. Anderson and I have known each other for 23 years but Dave and I simply did not see the same hockey game last Sunday in Philadelphia.

The Soviets began with a razzle-dazzle (cecapadeski display in their own zone, which the Flyers ignored. Then, as they tried to move, the Flyers, notably Terry Crisp, forechecked beautifully. Up ice, the Flyer defensemen took their customary inopportune view of rival forwards. The Soviets could control neither the puck nor the flow of the game. They had got off two shots, to the Flyers' 12, when Ed Van Impe dumped Valeri Kharlamov.

The Russians picked up Kharlamov and retreated to their dressing room, where they loitered until someone explained that a forfeit would mean everybody's money had to be refunded and the Soviet Union would be out $25,000. End of ideological protest.

The Flyers scored 17 seconds after the game resumed and again on a beautiful breakout by Rick MacLeish. They played with patience and intelligence, and they held their discipline.

Near the end, the Russians were reduced to purposeless skating. One grabbed, then cursed an official. Another slashed a bloody cut in Bobby Clarke's scalp.

Was Van Impe's bodycheck illegal? Did Victor Kutyergin mean to cut Clarke? Hockey is a rough, existential game and intimidation is a part of it, as surely as the ice is hard. Shero remarked once, "The answer to the physical part of hockey is simple. You have to have courage."

This complex, intense, family mysterious the puck nor the flow of the game. They had got off two shots, to the Flyers' 12, when Ed Van Impe dumped Valeri Kharlamov.

"to learn about the country my people came from." Thus he met Dostoyevsky and Tolstoy.

With minimal family enthusiasm, he became a hockey professional after World War II and played defense for 15 years—three with the Rangers, the rest in the minor leagues. He began minor league coaching in 1957 and learned his craft in half-empty arenas at Shawinigan, Quebec, and Omaha. He began coaching the Flyers in 1971, when he was 46, and his expansion Flyers won the Stanley Cup in successive years before winning the world championship last week.

"Was it political to you?" P said in the cubicle. "Did you feel that?"

The slight smile.

"It wasn't political. This is a children's game. It's played by men, but it's still a children's game."

He bent over a pad, a stocky man with eyeglasses and a bushy mustache, suddenly totally occupied with a play he was diagramming in the children's game of which he has at last become grand master.

I don't know yet if he returned Dave Anderson's call.

Sports Editor's Mailbox: Buying Good Seats/A Case for Lehigh/Instant Officials

To the Sports Editor:

I recently had the questionable privilege of spending the not-inconsiderable sum of $8.50 for a remote end-zone seat in Madison Square Garden.

Last summer I paid $4.50 to sit in the shadow of the right field foul pole at Shea Stadium. The Mets' management had the audacity to call these "box" seats. Who knows where I would have found myself if I had not purchased my tickets seven weeks in advance.

Only those relatively few people with the time, inclination and money to purchase season tickets get good seats in exchange for their good money. The rest of us pay the same price, but are relegated to the hinterlands.

There might be some justification for this "practice" on the part of the pro football teams, who play rain or shine. But for indoor or "fair weather" sports, there is no reason to insist on papering the house with season subscribers, usually business firms, and allotting only the "leavings" for the unincorporated fan.

If they can't spare a few really good seats for the average guy, then the managements of the Garden and Shea Stadium ought to provide at least a realistic differential in pricing the house. Why should I pay the same price for the last row in the end zone (because it's all I can get) as someone else pays for a midcourt seat?

I'm not complaining about ticket prices. My complaint is that I have been effectively foreclosed out of the Garden and Shea, no matter how much I might be willing to spend for a ticket.

For practical purposes, my money is not as good as someone else's. For the same price, I'll be in right field and he'll be behind the dugout. And I resent being played for a sucker by management.

So long as the present ticket allocation and pricing structures prevail, my attendance at these events will remain at their present level—the irreducible minimum. As soon as things change to the point where it becomes possible to buy a seat that doesn't require field glasses to know what's happening, then I and my three sons will become much more frequent customers.

And I'm sure that there are many more like us out there.

The Case for Lehigh
In Cup Controversy

To the Sports Editor:

In the Dec. 21 Mailbox, Charles Cabiac stated that the University of New Hampshire had been "ripped-off" by trigger-happy, so-called experts, the pollsters," because it was the Lambert Cup runner-up behind Lehigh, a team it defeated, 35-21, in a postseason playoff.

The Lambert Cup winner is determined by regular-season performance. Lehigh and New Hampshire had two common opponents—Maine, which Lehigh routed, 51-14, and Delaware, which Lehigh beat, 35-23. New Hampshire beat Maine, 24-15, but lost to Delaware, 16-7. Lehigh also had impressive victories over three Division I opponents—Penn by 34-23, Colgate by 38-6 and Rutgers by 34-20. Lehigh scored a third of the points given up by Rutgers in 11 games. If this isn't a mark of a fine team, what is? New Hampshire didn't play one Division I team.

Instant Officials,
Not Replays, Needed

To the Sports Editor:

While there may be an advantage to the use of several cameras ("The Replay Issue," Jan. 4), a more direct solution to the problem of sideline and end-zone calls in National Football League games would be the positioning of two additional officials on each sideline. With authority only on inbounds-out-of-bounds calls, one on each sideline would remain near the line of scrimmage and the other two would follow the deepest receiver running down their respective sidelines.

This solution makes deciding when to consult the camera's records and halting the game to do so unnecessary. Variations of the solution are already used in several international contact sports (rugby, soccer) at considerably less cost than a set of TV cameras.

Russians Praised
For Display of Skill

To the Sports Editor:

I must disagree with Neil Amdur's conclusion in his commentary on Ilya Nastase ("The Nasty Side of Nastase: True Artist Becomes Almost Pathetic," Dec. 14).

Agreeing that it can do no harm for Jimmy Connors or other friends to talk to life, it seems to me that the only solution would be an iron-clad one-year suspension. We're dealing with circumstances that go beyond one man's actions on the court.

If a hard example is not set now, behavior patterns like Nastase's may become the rule and not the exception. Connors and many other players are on that borderline and, should be younger players see this trend go unchecked, there will be little motivation for them not to join the parade. The Association of Tennis Professionals must suspend Nastase for all of 1976.

It's a shame to make Nastase the scapegoat. The fact is, though, that he has earned it and should wear a crown of thorns until he learns that no one is bigger than the sport he plays.

Steelers' Rounded Defense Provides Something for All

By MURRAY CHASS
Special to The New York Times

MIAMI, Jan. 17—Everyone owns about the Pittsburgh Steelers' defensive front four, a gargantuan group that is as menacing and intimidating as a street gang in a dark alley. Then there's the Steelers' secondary, which Coach Bart Starr of Green Bay says does fine a job with its double coverage of wide receivers any unit in the National Football League. And, finally, there are the Pittsburgh linebackers. "I like the front four," says Paul Wiggin of Kansas City. "And I like the secondary. But when it comes right down to it, it's those linebackers. They're the national!"

At the front four, the secondary and the linebackers other and they form the block that will confront Dallas Cowboys in the Super Bowl tomorrow. With an impregnable unit in them, how do the Cowboys expect to have a chance to mock off the defending champions? "Most people don't think we have a chance, but Landry hasn't spent the last two weeks doodling. It's a mind nimble and sharp enough to plot a strategy for the overthrow of the Steelers. It's Landry's. No New Wrinkles

But what kind of game he has devised remains to be seen tomorrow, but Wiggin, whose team played both the Steelers and the Cowboys this week, don't expect to see a team do anything drastically different from the way they used all year. "You get there," Starr said today by telephone. "It's cold, snowy Green Bay, and you're running successful programs. In the end, you go with what you know. You make a slight change in advantage of an individual idiosyncrasy, but all in all, they won't do anything or bizzare," Wiggin said. "Dallas will be a warmer but somewhat city. Dallas will be a night never have seen, but Pittsburgh is a team that adapts to all sorts of things. They're a team that says, 'If you come in here, I'm going to kill you.'"

In their over-all play, Staubach has shown an increasing appetite for throwing to Preston Pearson, the running back who used to handle the ball for Pittsburgh. In the two playoff games, Pearson caught 12 passes for 209 yards and three touchdowns. If the Steelers keep Staubach from getting the ball to Pearson and if the wide receivers are covered tightly, the quarterback might wind up running more than he had planned.

Edge to Staubach Terry Bradshaw, the Steelers quarterback, likes to run, too, if necessary. One important aspect of the game, then, could be how well the defensive ends contain the quarterbacks once they decide to take off.

The Steelers offense is predicated not nearly so much on the passing of Bradshaw as it is on the running of Franco Harris. Therefore, the Dallas defense will be aimed at stopping Harris.

Sam Rutigliano, who as an assistant coach with the New York Jets had to work on defensive plans for both Super Bowl teams this season, said Harris was perhaps the key to the whole game. "When you play guys like Franco or O.J.," Rutigliano said, "you have to gear everything to stopping them. Franco gets a lot of critical yardage running inside."

Red Smith Can't Find Czars Like Pete

MIAMI BEACH, Jan. 17—In the czar business, Pete Rozelle is out there in front, like Hertz or the Indiana basketball team. The supreme being of professional football isn't as tall as baseball's Bowie Kuhn, he isn't as old as hockey's Clarence Campbell, and, unlike basketball's Larry O'Brien, he has never had his office bugged by E. Howard Hunt. But when it comes down to the basics of czaring, like finding one of his employees, conducting a news conference or testifying before a Congressional committee, Alvin Ray Rozelle can give any of the others 15 pounds and name the round.

Terry Bradshaw, Steelers' quarterback, relaxing in Miami recently.

The countdown to Super Bowl X had reached VIII or IX when the Super Commissioner held his regular Super Week press conference yesterday, and today, 24 hours later, his inquisitors still haven't laid a glove on him. For an hour and five minutes several hundred candidates for the Nobel Prize for Literature threw questions at him, and when Don Weiss of the National Football League office broke it up, Pete was still up on his toes, moving and sticking with the cool composure of Sugar Ray Robinson. It was the worst mismatch in this town since Joe Namath and accomplices mugged the Baltimore Colts in Super Bowl III.

The football establishment has been struck repeated blows by the courts lately, yet the czar's royal head was neither bowed nor bloody when he took his stance behind a microphone in the Palladium Room of the Knover Hotel. He was impeccably turned out in a burgundy jacket, white shirt, burgundy tie with regimental stripes, dark trousers and polished loafers with shiny buckles. He had the super tan that is de rigeur on this golden strand.

A table at his left held the Vince Lombardi Trophy, a silver football on a three-sided base created by Tiffany's, which will go to either the Pittsburgh Steelers or Dallas Cowboys tomorrow afternoon, and the Bicentennial coin that will be tossed to decide which team kicks off. The coin is a one-pound disk of gold costing $4,000, and that says something about pro football. Not many years ago when Elmer Layden was Super Commissioner II, he had to come up with a half-dollar out of his own pants to decide such matters.

Hard Times Although all 80,187 tickets and an undetermined number of counterfeits have been sold for $20 and up, although receipts from the box office, television, radio and films on this one game will exceed $5 million, although postseason loot will exceed $25,000 for each winning player and $15,000 for each loser, these remain perilous times in the czarist view.

"It is a very negative period," Pete said of this era of perpetual litigation and capital-labor acrimony. He is saddened by repeated defeats in the Federal courts, where the college draft, the Rozelle rule and other facets of the reserve system have been held illegal, and by a worsening log jam in collective bargaining with the players.

He conceded that management had been unable to sell the court on the need to divide up new talent through the draft and to limit the players' freedom to change jobs, and he suggested that it might be necessary to abandon these practices temporarily to prove the point.

"Our rules are not etched in granite," he said. No club owner overheard him, so no death from apoplexy resulted. Though the rules could be changed, he said, he still believed firmly that players must not have "total freedom of movement" from one job to another. "We may have to let it happen," he said, and he painted a horrid picture of owners, players and fans suffering as competitive balance was destroyed, operating costs soared and ticket prices increased. Perhaps only by plunging the game into chaos could football prove that the old way was the best way.

The Love of Carroll Suppose, somebody said, sports were placed under the control of a Federal agency like the Securities and Exchange Commission. "Hell," said the czar. "It would be better than going into court every day. If it eliminated litigation, I'd be for it."

He estimated 1975 legal costs to the league and its clubs at $3.8 million. He said some owners had proposed that if the college draft was eliminated, squad limits should be cut from 43 to 36 men "to give the have-nots an equal chance." Others, he said, talked of establishing classified salary brackets.

He said the league would take the so-called Mackey case clear to the Supreme Court if necessary. That is the one in which a Federal court in Minneapolis found the draft, Rozelle rule, etc., illegal. He estimated that these appeals could consume two years or more.

He said he felt both owners and players needed a collective bargaining agreement, but he feared it was farther away today than ever before. (None has existed for two years.)

He said he felt his role as commissioner was to balance the interests of the owners, the players and the fans. He added wistfully that he would like to work more closely with the players than he can now. On a similar note, he said of Carroll Rosenbloom, the owner of the Los Angeles Rams who recently said Rozelle should be replaced: "I hope he grows to love me again."

He was patient, unflappable, adroit, informed, faithful to the party line and, no matter what some of these judges say, he sounded patently reasonable. You can't hardly find czars like Pete around today.

Virginia Girl Takes Top N.F.L. Prize. For Football Essay

Anna Leider, a 16-year-old junior at T. C. Williams High School in Alexandria, Va., has won first prize in the National Football League's $25,000 Bicentennial scholarship essay contest. She will receive a $10,000 college scholarship.

Youngsters were asked to submit essays of 500 to 750 words discussing the N.F.L.'s role in American history. In all, there were 12 prizes, including $1,000 grants to Catherine Croft of Fox Lane School, Bedford, N. Y., and Michael Jones of John F. Kennedy High School, Somers, N. Y.

Here is the winning essay:

By ANNA LEIDER

Henry Steele Commager, the noted historian, recently told The Wall Street Journal that in his view there was no connection whatsoever between the National Football League and the history of the United States.

Professor Commager is wrong. He should know that sports have always played a role in history. One cannot understand Sparta, for example, without considering that city's emphasis on gymnastics. One cannot study Athens without examining the Olympics. And one cannot explain England's greatness without hearing, over and over again, that the empire won its battles on "the playing fields of Eton."

What has been true for other nations is equally true for the United States. Sports are an expression of people, and people make history.

The most American of sports is football, of which the National Football League is the symbol, the pinnacle. Football is played only here and in Canada, a nation much like ours. No other country has taken to the game. Certainly, a historian cannot overlook this fact. He must ask, "What is it about football that makes it so attractive to Americans?"

The answer may be that our people's characteristics, self-view as a nation and ideals closely resemble football.

We think of ourselves as a people who work together for the greatest good; but each member of society, whether he or she be a baker, a seamstress, a doctor or a lawyer, must contribute his personal skill to that objective. Combined, these talents form a great, unified nation. It is the same in football. Each member of the team is a skilled specialist. The efforts of these specialists, working together, create great teams.

We think of ourselves as people who overcome huge odds in our early history. The westward expansion was physically demanding. One had to closely note the weather and the timing of the seasons. A great amount of personal bravery was needed in these times. It is the same in football. We see these qualities with which we identify—stamina, planning, taking advantage of weather and time, courage—reflected in a game.

We think of ourselves as an orderly society that obeys the law, with punishments for those who break it. It is the same in football. There are the rules of the game and the rules set by the coaches. Break them, and there are penalties and fines.

We think of ourselves as a nation free of prejudices, where the best will get ahead. It is the same in football. One's ability as a football player counts, not one's race or religion. Influential friends or family cannot win a player a position on the team, nor can he buy one. Only skill and talent count. This total impartiality is a motivator and inspiration to youth. It has helped thousands gain an education that otherwise might have been beyond their reach.

We think of ourselves as a nation of many distinct regions. We are Americans; but we are also Virginians, Texans or New Yorkers. It is the same in football. The sport is American, but the major teams are associated with cities, states and regions and thus help promote our sense of regional unity and pride. At the same time, teams help develop community spirit. Good high school and college teams develop a sense of unity in both their school and their community. A great National Football League team will accomplish the same for a major city, a state or even an entire region.

Thus, football is a mirror of ourselves. It reflects our desire for unity among people, our belief in courage, fitness and good planning to reach our final goals; our respect for laws and rules and our trust that skill and talent are what count in getting ahead. However, football protects our desire for regional unity and pride. We adopt these things into our lives and are better off for it. That is what is American about football, and what Professor Commager needs to understand.

Sudden Death to Settle Tie

MIAMI, Jan. 17 — The Super Bowl game between the Pittsburgh Steelers and the Dallas Cowboys will be played to a sudden-death finish if the teams are tied at the end of regulation 60 minutes.

The team scoring first, by a safety, field goal or touchdown, in overtime will win the National Football League championship.

In the event of a tie after four quarters, the referee will toss a coin to determine the receiving team and field position for overtime play.

Following a three-minute intermission, play will resume with an overtime kickoff and continue through 15-minute segments until a score. There will be a two-minute break between each overtime period, with the teams changing goals.

Rules for game timing and the number of time-outs will be the same as in a regular-season game, including the last two minutes of the second and fourth quarters.

Japanese Fans Will Get a Taste Of U.S. College Football Today

By RICHARD HALLORAN

Special to The New York Times

TOKYO, Jan. 17—When the two teams of American college football all-stars square off here tomorrow, their ears will ring with shouts of "yatsukero," the Japanese equivalent for "Beat 'em."

The first Japan bowl will also be the first time two American teams have played each other before a Japanese crowd. More than 50,000 spectators are expected in the National Stadium built for the 1964 Olympics.

Among the standouts on the East team will be Cornelius Greene, the Ohio State quarterback, Don Buckley, a wide receiver from Carolina State, and two linebackers, Greg Buttle of Penn State and Ray Preston of Syracuse. On the West squad are John Scarra, the quarterback, U.C.L.A., Chuck Muncie, the star running back from California, and Leroy and Dewey Selmon of the Oklahoma defensive line. A few Japanese all-stars will fill out both squads.

The interest in the Japan bowl and the Japanese who will play alongside Americans attests to the surging popularity of football here. Last Sunday, the Japanese closed out their season with the annual Rice Bowl, in which the West, California, stopped the East All-Stars three times inside the 5-yard line and intercepted four passes to win, 14-10.

About 25,000 people, up 5,000 over last year, turned out for the game. In addition, it was carried on nationwide television for the first time in more than 10 years.

What is called American football here, to distinguish it from rugby and soccer, came to Japan in 1934 when an American missionary teaching at a Christian university, Rikkyo, organized teams there and at Meiji and Waseda Universities.

Football got a lift during the American occupation when Japanese either saw American service teams in action or played against them. But the sport has caught hold only in recent years, perhaps because of the showing of imported television films of American professional and college games.

In the last three years, 14 new college teams have been formed to bring the total here to 170, split roughly between the Tokyo and Osaka areas. There are few teams outside those two regions. Osaka has four leagues and Tokyo five.

But there are also 70 high school teams and recently four junior high schools have formed clubs. In addition, there are a number of club teams of college graduates, such as the Yellow Sharks, the Silver Stars, and the Thunderers.

There's no professional football here—yet. A player for the Yellow Sharks said that "even though the number of people who watch or play the game has increased in recent years, it's still not enough. If Japan had professional teams now, it wouldn't pay."

Even so, Japan may be the only country outside the United States where football has caught on in a major way. It is the avowed intention of the Japanese Football Association, to field a team that can beat an American college team. In at least four exhibition games so far, that hasn't happened.

The most obvious difference between American and Japanese football is the size of the players. The heaviest players on the West team today were a 194-pound center and a tackle the same size.

Tamano, the quarterback, was the lightest on his squad, at 136 pounds, and his wide receiver, Ogawa, weighs 174. The East team also had a 104-pound tackle, but their best running back, Guchi, the American occupation when Japanese either saw American service teams in action or played against them. But the sport has caught hold only in recent years, perhaps because of the showing of imported television films of American professional and college games.

In their mastery of the game's fundamentals, however, the Japanese are spotty. Their running is good—fast and shifty—but lacks power. The tackling is low and hard and gang tackles are common. The passing is fair, but unimaginative.

The blocking is weak, with too much high brush-blocking and few low, sustained drives. The punting is erratic and lacks both distance and control.

Moreover, like many things the Japanese have imported from the West, much of their football is mechanical rather than instinctive. Pass patterns, for instance, are run as drawn and not adjusted to the defense.

On the other hand, there is strong evidence that football, like many other imports, is rapidly being assimilated. Iguichi, the East running back, could make a good American college team, despite his size. He has the speed, the agility, the sense to follow his blockers, and a good pair of hands. Most important, he lets his instincts tell him what to do.

Similarly, the West's wide receiver, Ogawa, consistently broke loose by using his head. He also knew just where he was on the field as he caught one touching pass in the corner of the end zone and did a little quick step to keep his feet in bounds.

In one other aspect, the Japanese showed they have a way to go to master the game. The electric scoreboard, using the English word for down and yards, reflected the constant Japanese confusion over the letters "L" and "R." Referee came out "Lefely."

The Jets have conducted their search in such secrecy that any football official who is asked here says he has heard nothing and knows nothing about what Al Ward is doing.

He has talked with Clark and Marv Levy, coach of the Montreal Alouettes, of the Canadian League, and he is also believed to have talked with Joe Paterno of Penn State and asked the Pittsburgh Steelers' permission to speak with Bud Carson, their defensive coordinator. However, Ward isn't advertising his efforts and he apparently is in no particular hurry to hire someone.

Stram Is Selected as Coach of the Saints

Special to The New York Times

MIAMI, Jan. 17 — White the New York Jets secretively search for a coach, the New Orleans Saints have filled their vacancy by hiring Hank Stram, the former Kansas City coach.

Stram's selection was learned today. The appointment was believed scheduled for announcement next Tuesday.

Stram, who spent the 1975 season as a football announcer for CBS, was the only coach the Chiefs had in the first 15 years of their existence. However, the Chiefs crumbled steadily from their Super Bowl championship of 1970 and he was dismissed after the 1974 season. He replaces Ernie Heffelfe at New Orleans.

The dapper Stram becomes the fifth head coach for the 1976 season. Of course, it remains to be seen whether Stram, who coached the Kansas City Chiefs and John McKay of Tampa Bay have teams to coach because of the court suit involving the National Football League's expansion draft.

The other new coaches are Monte Clark, San Francisco, and Bill Johnson, Cincinnati. That leaves the Jets and the Philadelphia eagles with the only vacancies.

X Marks the 10th

MIAMI, Jan. 17—Separately, only a few of the Super Bowl games have developed a sense of drama. But collectively, they have produced a sense of history.

In the beginning, the fascination of the Super Bowl was a journey to the unknown, the Green Bay Packers of Vince Lombardi and the National Football League against the Kansas City Chiefs from "the other league."

The Times legend was confirmed. But then Joe Namath and the New York Jets astonished the establishment with a 16-7 upset of the Baltimore Colts that retained the identity of the American Football League teams in the 1970 realignment. After that, one of those former A.F.L. teams, the Miami Dolphins of Don Shula, earned comparison with the Packers.

And now the Pittsburgh Steelers hope to win their second consecutive championship in Super Bowl X against the Dallas Cowboys tomorrow.

Those moments of history have been more memorable than the games themselves.

—As the A.F.L. qualifier, the Chiefs were mostly unknown and unadmired but not unloved. Fred (The Hammer) Williamson, a cornerback who made more noise than tackles, spoke of how he intended to "break helmets" with his karate strength. But in the second half of the Packers' 35-10 victory, The Hammer was knocked unconscious by Donny Anderson's block. Lombardi later was asked why it had taken the Packers that long to level him. "It took him that long," Lombardi said, "to make a tackle."

The Guarantee

And then Lombardi answered a question before it was asked.

"Kansas City has a good team but it doesn't compare with some of the teams in the N.F.L.," the coach said. "That's what you want me to say, isn't it? Well, there, I've said it."

—The Packers won again, 33-14, over the Oakland Raiders in Lombardi's last game as their coach.

"We played the last 30 minutes for the Old Man," Jerry Kramer said. "We didn't want to let him down."

—With a napkin-wrapped glass of Johnny Walker Red in one hand, Joe Namath predicted, "We're going to win Sunday, I guarantee you." And the Jets won. When the club owners met a few months later to shape the N.F.L. under the merger agreement, the 10 A.F.L. teams were joined by the Colts, the Steelers and the Cleveland Browns in what is now the American Conference. But if the Jets had lost, the structure of both conferences probably would be a mixture of the two leagues.

—The Dolphins, unfairly as it developed, in a gambling scandal, Len Dawson played quarterback impeccably for the Chiefs in a 33-7 victory over the Minnesota Vikings.

—Jim O'Brien's 32-yard field goal with 5 seconds remaining provided the Colts with a 16-13 triumph over the Dallas Cowboys and then O'Brien said, "I had this dream last week, this long field goal going through to end it all, but I didn't know I'd be the kicker."

—The Dolphins' six interceptions and five lost fumbles but thrill-seekers loved them. So did the Colts, because they had somewhat erased their earlier embarrassment.

VI—President Nixon suggested that the Dolphins use a "down and in" pass from Bob Griese to Paul Warfield, but the Cowboys geared their defense for it. "We made sure," said Tom Landry, the Cowboys' coach, "they didn't complete that pass on us." And the Cowboys finally erased their stigma of not being able to win the big one with a decisive 24-3 victory. Roger Staubach emerged as a quarterback. Duane Thomas emerged as an enigma.

"You must be faster than you appear," he was told.

Jethro Pugh, Cowboys' defensive tackle, in Miami with his 4-year-old daughter, Jethrolyn.

chartered how the angle of the sun in After a pause, Duane Thomas replied, "evidently."

The Los Angeles Memorial Coliseum would slant into the eyes of his pass receivers and runback specialists. But the Redskins had no chart for the Dolphins' defense. The only Dolphin mistake was made by Gary Yepremian, their Cyriop place-kicker who tried to throw a pass after a blocked field-goal attempt. The pass was intercepted for the Redskins' only touchdown.

"I thought I was doing something good, something to help the team," Yepremian said. "Instead it was almost a tragedy."

VIII—The Dolphins dominated the Vikings, 24-7, and joined the Packers as the only two-time winners. Larry Csonka rumbled for 133 yards despite a few stitches at half-time over one eye, a souvenir of Wally Hilgenberg's forearm.

"It was a cheap shot," Csonka explained with a smile. "But it was a class cheap shot. He didn't sneak up behind me. He came right at me."

IX—In their 42d season, the Steelers finally won a championship for Art Rooney, their long-suffering owner, with a 16-6 victory as the Vikings lost for the third time. Franco Harris galloped for 158 yards while the Steelers' defensive unit dominated Fran Tarkenton. They even blocked or tipped four of Tarkenton's passes.

"I don't remember that ever happening to me before," Tarkenton said.

And in Super Bowl X tomorrow, those Steeler pass rushers will be tormenting Roger Staubach while the Cowboys' defense tries to control Franco Harris with Landry's mysterious "flex" defense. I like the Steelers, 24-21. Perhaps there will be a sense of drama this time as well as a sense of history.

Pro Bowl Endangered By Row Over Pensions play the game, but he would not lead them in any particular direction.

"They might decide to play it or not to play it," Garvey said. "I don't know what they're going to do. If the players think they're playing for the pension, they should know that's not true."

In an attempt to clarify the status of the pension plan, which has become muddled because of the labor dispute between the association and the 26 club owners, Alexander wrote to Commissioner Pete Rozelle on Jan. 8. Alexander didn't release the letter, but copies of that and Rozelle's reply were obtained.

"As long as I can remember," Alexander wrote, "the Pro Bowl has been publicized as the 'pension game.' Over the years, players reluctant to perform in the game were reminded that the proceeds went to the pension fund. . . I am acutely aware of the absence of a contribution to the fund for the 1974 season and I am questioning whether a contribution will be made on March 31, 1976, to cover the 1975 season."

In his reply of Jan. 9, Rozelle said the 1970 league-

Foreman And Lyle To Fight

AS VEGAS, Jan. 17 (AP)—George Foreman, the former heavyweight king, who is expected to fight a rematch with Muhammad Ali, was last seen on national television in a fight now referred to as the "Fronzo Five."

It will be more than an exhibition at Caesars Palace on Saturday afternoon when he faces Ron Lyle in front of a national television audience.

On Feb. 20 in Puerto Rico, he will risk "the crown" took from Foreman in the 15 months ago against a nonentity named Jean-Pierre Coopman of Belgium, shouldn't be much more in a workout.

But the promoter, Don King, said he expected Ali to put his crown on the line just Ken Norton, probably New York, around July 4. King stopped Pedro Lovell five rounds here last Saturday.

A few Team of Handlers Foreman, has a new manager, Gil Clancy, and a new trainer, Kid Rapidez. He also has a new adviser, Jim Simon, the movie actor and former football star.

What he's tried to do is "graduate the positive," Clancy, who managed the Griffith and Jerry Remy. "We haven't changed the style. We just want to do the things he does like throw jabs."

It's got the strongest job in business and he's going to his trademark. He's been wide with his punches. We've worked with him to shorten up on his jab.

He thinks that 1976 is going to be the year of George Foreman, the ex-champion who wants to Beat Champion Foreman will take a 40-1 odds record into the Lyle. He has 37 knockouts, was stopped in eight rounds by Ali.

"Africa is in the past," Foreman said. "I think Ali's tremendous fighter. I lost to him and the only way I can be champion again is to beat him."

The 24-year-old Lyle, who is meeting a legitimate contender, Ali stopped in a title fight here last year.

There is no such thing as a plan in boxing," Lyle said. "When you get right down to the nitty-gritty, it is a matter of survival."

He considers himself as the contender in the top 10. He has fought some of the best fighters and stood up to some good fighters. He's human, he knows it's like to be the victor of a knockout."

Title Changed Life

Foreman reigned as the champion for nearly 10 years. According to King, he changed in that somebody handed you and a half million dollars, change you, then change you, then change you, then change you. Then he has something never had before. He lost a fight, it was a big shock, too."

Houston McTear, left, of Florida, beating Valery Borzov of the Soviet Union in the 50-yard dash during the Sunbist invitation games in Los Angeles on Friday. Borzov was a gold medalist at the 1972 Olympics.

Mile Race Is Captured By Waldrop

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 17 (AP)—Tony Waldrop, flashing the form that propelled him to a world indoor mile record two years ago, captured the one-mile run last night at the 16th Sunbist invitation track meet as Marty Liquori faded in the stretch.

Waldrop, the former North California runner, was timed in 4 minutes 2 seconds, seven seconds slower than the record he set in 1974.

Danie Malan of South Africa led the lead with Liquori, who is now concentrating on longer races, running second.

Waldrop rallied from far off the pace to pass both and slashed into the tape one-tenth of a second ahead of Malan, with Liquori one second farther back.

It was a meet without a world record, but three pole vaulters nearly got one.

Yuri Isakov of the Soviet Union, Dan Ripley of the Pacific Coast Club and Don Baird of Long Beach State all cleared 17 feet 6 inches and had good attempts at 18-2, which would have broken Ripley's week-old world mark of 18-1 1/2.

Baird, an Australian citizen, had the closest miss as he attempted to better his career best indoors or out by six inches.

Isakov took only two vaults at the world record before injuring a leg, and the competitors finished in the above order on fewer misses.

Russ Rogers of the University of Southern California also cleared 17-6.

Martha Watson of Lakewood International, the new track coach at Dominguez Hills State College, captured the women's long jump with a leap of 21-4 3/4, and Aroie Robinson won the men's event with 25-10 1/2. Both events were contested on to a new long-jump mattress instead of the traditional sand pit, and the athletes had no complaints about the surface.

The meet opened on an explosive note when Houston McTear defeated rivals in two sprints: within 15 minutes.

N.C.A.A. Cancels Restrictions On Size of Road, Home Teams

10 and 13; water polo, 12 and 15, and wrestling, 12 and 15.

The N.C.A.A. imposed the limitations during a special convention on economy last August. But they proved to be unpopular.

The football limits for the 1975 season were 48 on the traveling and 60 on the home team. Before the season opened, Alabama sued the N.C.A.A. to set aside the limitations. But a Federal District Court in New Orleans made a temporary ruling in favor of the N.C.A.A. last September.

Knight brought his suit without official support from Indiana University. He also was set back on a temporary ruling favoring the N.C.A.A. limits. Both cases would have been appealed to higher courts.

The reversal was as big a victory for minor-sport coaches as for football and basketball coaches. The IC4-A track and cross-country coaches had strongly endorsed unlimited sizes for those sports, and had even suggested that their colleges quit the N.C.A.A. if it

The original move to lift all restrictions was made by the Eastern College Athletic Conference, which has the largest single bloc of votes at the convention.

Meanwhile, the N.C.A.A. tightened a recruiting regulation. It had stipulated that a college's representative could visit a prospective athlete only three times off campus. Now it included relatives of the athlete in those visits. It had been possible for a coach to see a boy only three times, but his parents as many times as possible.

Also, the association expanded calendar limits on recruiting to include the entire year after a boy finished his junior year of high school. This eliminates restrictions that put specific dates on recruiting in each sport, such as from Oct. 15 to the second Saturday in February for football.

Plans to reorganize the association into four divisions in football so that there would be a "super conference" of about 80 of the strongest teams were postponed for a year. It was decided to establish a committee to study the question.

Colleges such as Alabama, Texas, Arkansas, Notre Dame and Penn State favor a super conference, especially for television and box-office revenue.

Series Between Bayi, Walker In New Zealand Is Called Off

By BOB HERSH

The much-anticipated series of races between Filbert Bayi and John Walker, which was to have begun next Wednesday in New Zealand, has been canceled. Bayi, the 22-year-old Tanzanian who holds the world record for 1,500 meters, was withdrawn from the competition by his nation's athletic officials when they learned that a South African softball team had been invited to play in a tournament in New Zealand later this month.

Bayi and Walker were to have met four times in 11 days, concluding with a 1,500-meter dual in Auckland that had been billed as a preview of this summer's Olympic final at that distance. Walker, a New Zealander, broke the 3-minute-50-second barrier (and Bayi's pending record of 3:51.0) when he ran the mile in 3:49.4 last August.

Filbert Bayi beating John Walker in 1974 Commonwealth Games in world-record time for 1,500 meters.

America's top miler, Marty Liquori, will run the Wanamaker Mile at the Millrose Games here Jan. 30, but he continues to lean toward the 5,000 meters (3.1 miles) as his choice for the Olympics.

Two knowledgeable Liquori watchers agree with his inclination towards the 5,000. "I think he can win the 5,000 if he has time to train properly," said Jumbo Elliott, Liquori's undergraduate coach at Villanova. Fred Dwyer, his coach at Essex Catholic High School in Newark and now coach at Manhattan College, said, "I've always thought Marty's best even should be the 5,000. He has an abundance of speed for that distance, but not for the 1,500."

Liquori knows this. "I have never had a lot of speed and I have always trained more or less as a 5,000 runner," he said.

But he also knows that if he does not run the "metric mile," some people will think that he is ducking a showdown against the seemingly unbeatable Bayi and Walker and seeking refuge in a softer event.

"My father says that to me all the time," Liquori admitted. "I'm trying to get over that feeling myself."

the world amateur record by more than three feet. Next in the balloting were Karl-Hans Reihm, the West German hammer thrower (133 points); Guy Druet, the French high hurdler (122), and Bruce Jenner, the American decathlete (114).

Dwight Stones, who broke the indoor high jump record four times last winter, was chosen indoor athlete of the year. Houston McTear, the 18-year-old Floridian who equaled the world record of 9.0 seconds for the 100-yard dash, was named the top high school athlete. Oldfield's put was selected as the outstanding performance.

Eleven Soviet athletes will conclude their brief American tour Friday. Valery Borzov, the Olympic 100- and 200 meter champion, will lead a group of five at the San Francisco Examiner invitation meet. The rest will compete in Philadelphia's Bicentennial Track Classic. The Philadelphia contingent includes Vladimir Kishkun, the European pole vault champion; Yevgeny Arzhanov, the Olympic 800-meter silver medalist, and Ludmila Maslakova, the top Soviet female sprinter.

Emiel Puttemans has apparently recovered from the tonsillitis that curtailed his 1975 season. Last weekend in Paris, the Belgian distance runner lowered his world indoor record in the 5,000-meter run to 13:20.8, bettering the previous record by 3.8 seconds. His three-mile split en route was 12:54.6, another record. Puttemans also holds the outdoors 5,000-meter record of 13:13. But he won a silver medal in the 1972 Olympics in the 10,000, and says his best prospects for Montreal again lie in the longer race.

W.H.A. Dissolves Ottawa Civics Team

TORONTO, Jan. 17 (UPI)—The World Hockey Association announced today the dissolution of the Ottawa Civics, formerly the Denver Spurs, reducing the four-year-old league to 13 teams. After a three-hour board of trustees meeting, the league said in a statement that "the Ottawa Civics have formally ceased operation."

William Putnam, executive assistant to Ben Hatskin, W.H.A. board chairman, said there would be no draft of players from the Ottawa squad and that "they are free to make their own arrangements."

Vahri Is Acclaimed For Dual Victories

By ED CORRIGAN

Vahri, owned by Lynn Jones of Smithtown, was the only mount to win more than one championship last year in the Long Island High Score Awards Association's competition. A horse of the green and regular working hunter titles. He won the green championship with 359 points, beating out Penny Morton's Cease Fire by only 14 points.

In the regular division, Vahri scored 104 points. This was a close contest. The runner-up, Pretty Good Farm's Light 'n Lively, who won the green crown last year, had 89 points.

Lancer's Jewel, owned by Mary Riattoli of Huntington Station, reserve champion in 1974, won the amateur-owner hunter title easily with 90 points.

Hel-Lo Farm's Top Secret captured the junior working hunter championship with 21 points. Vincent Sava of Rockville, who rode Secret weapon to the same championship in 1973 and 1974, was aboard Top Secret in all events.

Steven Weiss's Superstition reserve champion with 79 points.

Pepper Hill, owned and ridden by Billy Rice of Huntington, scored more points than any other competitor on Long Island—571 in winning the large pony division along the way. Pepper Hill on 12 championships. Lisa Cardino's Bachelor Buttons as the small pony winner with 463 points.

The combined preliminary and intermediate jumper title went to Lord Raven, owned by Ralph deSantis of Deer Park, with 335 points. Holly Scott handled Lord Raven most of the show appearances. The triumph was decisive one. Robert Lehman'sissy Cat was the runner-up with 111 points.

Lord Raven was reserve champion to Libra, who died months ago.

Roman Indian, owned by Sam Renna of St. James, won the junior jumper title with 56 points, beating out Robert Marcus's Beau Geste from Laurel Hollow, who compiled 46 points. Two adult equitation competitions were won decisively.

Linda Peters of Northport placed 415 points to capture the 12-division division over Susan Hunter of Roslyn, who placed 247. Lisa Levy of Roslyn won the over-25 section with 33 points. Marilyn Meisler, also of Roslyn, was second with 81 points.

The association has instituted some new rules governing shows this year. This will mark the 17th year the organization has been in existence. In a notice mailed to member shows, the association has ruled that no show may be a member unless it is a regular member (not local) of the American Horse Shows Association.

Also, applications for dates must be received by the association office two months in advance (rather than one month as in the past), accompanied by appropriate fees.

When two shows apply for dates on the same week-end, the show whose application is received first will be granted the date. If another show desires to run on the same weekend, it will be required to pay double dues.

Officials of the association explained that the new regulations were put into effect because of the proliferation of one-day shows on Long Island and the resultant demands placed on exhibitors and horses as well as diminishing financial returns for show managements.

Right Mind Takes Mile At Aqueduct bought Right Mind three years ago from Frank Whitley for $8,500.

"He's a good athlete," said Kronovich, whose horse raced 32 times last year and 26 times in 1974. "I've had to race him against tougher, though, because I can't afford to find a spot for him."

Right Mind, who spent his early years chasing such stars as Foolish Pleasure and Avator, raced for a claiming price of $40,000 only six starts ago last November.

"I've had to put him in claiming races a half-dozen times," said Kronovich, "when I couldn't find anything else for him, and believe me, I've worked every time that he would be claimed."

The trainer, who says at 235 pounds he is only 5 to 10 pounds over his playing weight, still has an interest in pro football. "I think 7 points is a gift," he said about the Super Bowl. "These are the two best teams in football."

The fans not yet worried about getting even in today's football game, had made Our Hero the second choice. But Condoro, who came back especially to ride the Phipps sprinter, did not think much of his chances at a mile on a day when front-runners usually came into the stretch gasping for breath after going into the wind down the backstretch.

Condoro, who returned with a cold and a clogged ear, managed three other winners, but his fears about Our Hero were realized. "I guess," he said before the race, "that I have to chase Hole in the Pants. If I don't, nobody does and she win easy."

"But I got a feeling we'll both lose if I chase her."

Condoro, a fine handicapper. He and Robyn Smith, aboard the Hobeau Farm's sprinter, set the early pace, but both were passed in the final sixteenth by Right Mind and General Beauregard.

Liekoski Follows Miller's Example In Leaving College Soccer for Pros

By ALEX YANNIS

Timo Liekoski is the latest young coach to leave the college ranks for the pros because he has "learned all I could in college." Liekoski has left Hartwick one of the strongest in the country, to become Al Miller's assistant with the Dallas Tornado of the American Soccer League.

Miller, the first native American to coach in the N.A.S.L., was Liekoski's coach at Hartwick when Liekoski played there. When Miller left Hartwick, he coached the Philadelphia Atoms to the league championship in 1973. Liekoski took over at Hartwick led the Oneonta, N. Y., school to the National Collegiate Athletic Association tournament three straight years.

When Miller was offered the Dallas job by Lamar Hunt, who owns the Tornado, he quickly asked Liekoski to join him. The two are good friends, but often disagree when it comes to coaching.

"We are gonna argue a lot. I'm sure," Liekoski said, "but he told me that if we put our minds together we can come up with something good."

Miller said that Liekowski won't be just an assistant. He said Liekowski would be in charge of the Tornado coaching school, share in coaching the Tornado and also, perhaps, remain on the coaching staff of the United States Soccer Federation.

Liekowski has a class A license in coaching from the Federation.

"I was impressed with the Tornado organization and Lamar Hunt's attitude toward me," Liekowski said at last week's coaches' convention in Philadelphia. "Besides, not very many people get a chance to work with Miller and make money at the same time."

Previously, Miller's trail from college to pro coaching was followed by Terry Fisher, coach of the Los Angeles Aztecs; Hubert Vogelsinger of the Boston Minutemen; Greg Myers of the Miami Toros; Bill Hughes, formerly with the Rochester Lancers, and Don Bates of the San Antonio Thunder. Hughes has returned to Brockport State.

Casey Bahr, brother of Chris Bahr the Penn State all-American, played soccer for the United States Olympic team and pro for the Philadelphia Atoms, as did Chris. Casey has recently gotten out of the Navy and is seeking a job as a kicker in the National Football League.

Walter Bahr, the soccer coach at Penn State and father of Casey and Chris, says Casey is practicing kicking and punting on his own.

The older Bahr also said that a couple of N.F.L. teams have told Chris that he could play pro soccer in the summer and kick footballs in the fall—if one of those teams draft him.

The Tampa Bay Rowdies, the defending N.A.S.L. champions, posted a victory over several English clubs in getting Rodney Marsh from Manchester City of the English First Division. The Rowdies purchased Marsh outright for a sum reported to be close to $300,000.

Beau Rogers, the co-owner and general manager of the Rowdies, said: "Next to the Cosmos signing Pele we feel this is one of the brightest things to happen to the N.A.S.L. in its entire history. It's a great accomplishment for the league."

Go West: Bad Advice For Rangers

The Rangers had to get up to set out for Pittsburgh, where this trip will end tomorrow against the Penguins.

"As soon as the plane gets high enough for the wings to ice up," a cynic observed, "Ferguson may send them out there to practice."

This was the fourth game the Rangers had played under their new leader and it was the worst. They won the first two, in Kansas City and Chicago. They lost the third, 5-1 at Vancouver Wednesday night. Ferguson's purpose in being coach this season, as well as general manager for longer, is to get a first-hand look, and this was an eye-roller.

In all fairness, it must be noted that the Seals are a rapidly improving hockey team, more so than the fans back in New York probably realize. Gary Simmons, in his second straight shutout, beat the Rangers for the first time in his career.

Wayne Merrick, who scored the first two goals and harassed Espinoza brought his team-leading figures to 17 goals and 22 points.

Jack Evans is the California coach this season, and the Seals are making progress. They have won four and tied one of their last six games; and now have 16 victories with 36 games to play. At last season they won only 18.

Still, a 7-0 defeat in any hockey game can't be rationalized.

"Maybe it was a Super Bowl preview," the cynic suggested. "That game may wind up with a 7-0 score, too."

But the Rangers weren't laughing at anything.

Fanciers, Coming Up From Florida, Will Find Two New Shows in Virginia

By WALTER R. FLETCHER

To the pessimists who warned this is a bad time to launch a dog show, Virginia has come up with not only one newcomer, but two. Next weekend the Skyline Kennel Club event will be held at Fishersville on Saturday and the Charlottesville show will open at the University of Virginia on Sunday.

"We weighed the issue for more than a year," said Allen Voshell, the C-A show chairman and a member of the Skyline board, "and finally decided to take a chance."

The gamble has paid off. Skyline has an entry of 1,318 and C-A 1,394. "We were just hoping to break 1,000," said Tom Quimby, Skyline's show chairman.

What has happened is that the Florida circuit ends early in the year. Exhibitors are taking an extra three days of vacation in the Sunshine State. On the way back they'll show in Virginia.

Skyline formed in 1967, as 100 members. It's very well oriented. Of its top officers, four are engaged with the educated set. They are Mrs. John Swartz, the president and a breeder of Labradors; Dillon Hibbett, vice president and obedience chairman; Fred Cole, treasurer and Mrs. Irvon Goodson, the corresponding secretary. Mrs. William Fletcher, the recording secretary, keeps to the breed ring, with Norwich terriers. The club has held obedience training courses from its inception and Mrs. Douglas Fisher, a member of the board, is the instructor.

Quimby and his wife, Linda, are dachshund fanciers. "We have 30," said Mrs. Quimby. "We have all three varieties and have bred a half-dozen champions."

C-A was organized in 1970, when a group, attending a seminar at the university, decided it was time to have a club. There now are 75 members, with women presiding. Mrs. Gordon Haines, a breeder of Scottish deerhounds and borzoi, is president. Mrs. Harold Edwards, vice president; Mrs. G. H. Browne, and Mrs. Rowland Eager, secretaries. Haines is the treasurer.

The club also stresses obedience and its two obdiency rings will be on the basketball court. Labradors, two of whom are outstanding—Ch. Zipper's Hustler Wahoo, C.D.X., T.D., and his wife, who is obedience chairman, have lish Muffin, U.D. "Martha Lee [Mrs. Voshell] does all the training and handling," said her husband. "Zipper has two legs on his U.D. When he gets his third, he will be one of the few champion Labs to have a U.D.T. Muffin has qualified for the tracking test. Should she pass, we believe she will be the first Lab champion bitch to earn a U.D.T."

The star of the Florida circuit has been an Irish water spaniel, Ch. Oaktree's Irishocrat, owned by Anne Snelling of Ottawa, Dugan, as he is called, started at Sarasota and was best sporting dog five times in a row. At St. Petersburg, he led a field of 2,204 for best.

Other winners were Joan Fisher's bulldog, Ch. Show Biz Fairy Prince, at Daytona; James and Mary Ann Griffith's chow chow, Ch. Chow Mar Ja's Shou Ling, at Sarasota; John Playfair's and Patricia Gray's Aighan, Ch. Alpha Friendly Guy, at Palmetto; Richard Hense's Scottie, Ch. Dunbar's Democrat of Sandown, at Clearwater; and Mrs. and Mrs. Dean Hamblin's boxer, Ch. Salgrays V.I.P., at Tampa Bay.

"This is the first time I've been on the circuit," said Anna Katharine Nicholas, the well-known judge. "Now I hope to attend every year. The poodles are beyond anything I've seen in a long time, with entries from 100 to 150. Quality is outstanding. Dobes have had roughly 150 at each show and Great Danes 100. There even have been 10 American foxhounds."

"St. Petersburg had the most beautiful setting of any of the West Coast shows. There were picnic tables under the palm trees, so exhibitors could sit and chat. Clearwater was unseasonably cold and there was rain at Palmetto. Entries steadily increased from 1,472 at Daytona to 2,434 at Tampa, the state's largest show. It was Tampa's golden anniversary and there was a beautiful catalogue to commemorate the event."

Klammer Wins Cup Ski Race

Jeff Borowiak during match in Atlanta on Friday in which he upset Bjorn Borg, 3-6, 6-4, 6-4.

MORZINE, France, Jan. 17 (AP)—Franz Klammer, Austria's Olympic gold medal hopeful, led a virtual Austrian sweep of the top places in a downhill ski race today and edged Ingemar Stenmark, a slalom specialist, out of first place in the World Cup standing.

It was the 22-year-old Austrian star's third World Cup downhill victory of the season and made him the man to beat in the event of next month's Winter Olympics in Innsbruck, Austria.

But with Stenmark trailing him by only five points in the standing and only two downhill races remaining in the current season against a total of seven slaloms and giant slaloms, a Cup title for Klammer was far from assured. Klammer still has to earn a point in a slalom or giant slalom this season.

Bernhard Russi of Switzerland, a downhill gold medalist at the 1972 Olympics in Sapporo, Japan, took second place in the race and was the only non-Austrian to break into the top five finishers.

Klammer flashed down the icy, 3,080-meter course, with a vertical drop of 885 meters, in 1 minute 54.24 seconds. Russi finished in 1:54.33.

Three Austrians who, with Klammer, are virtually certain to be selected for Austria's Olympic downhill team, took third, fourth and fifth places. They were Anton Steiner, a 17-year-old in his second international racing season, who was timed in 1:58.88, followed by Klaus Eberhard, 1:55.55, and Werner Grissman, 1:55.73.

Karl Anderson, of Greene, Me., was the best-placed American. He finished 11th in 1:56.67 and was narrowly edged out of a World Cup point for 10th place by Martin Berthod of Switzerland, timed in 1:56.59.

Miss Zechmeister Wins BERCHTESGADEN. West Germany, Jan. 17 (UPI)—A spill by her French rival, Patricia Emomet, helped Christa Zechmeister of West Germany win a women's World Cup slalom ski race today, her first victory on the current circuit.

Zig-zagging stylishly down the Jenner course outside this Bavarian winter sports area, the 18-year-old Miss Zechmeister clocked a two-hat aggregate time of 1:40.47 seconds.

Danielle Debernard of France finished second and Hanni Wenzel of Liechtenstein was third.

Miss Zechmeister was second after the first heat, while Miss Emomet held the top position. But a spill in the second run threw the French woman out of the race, paving the way for Miss Zechmeister's victory.

The competition kicked off the second half of the current World Cup circuit, a major pre-Olympic tryout.

Betsy Clifford of Canada finished fifth and Cindy Nelson of Lutsen, Minn., placed eighth in the strong field. Rose Mittermaier, West Germany's Olympic hope, had to settle for a disappointing ninth place, but nevertheless held on to the commanding lead in the World Cup standing with 153 points.

Brigitte Totschnig of Austria, the runner-up in the World Cup classification, has 112 points and Bernadette Zurbriggen of Switzerland has 109.

OHIO FUND BACKS RICH RACE, TROT

COLUMBUS, Ohio (AP)—Colt and filly races worth $1.5 million, including two $100,000-plus events for 1976, have been allocated by the new Ohio Standardbred Development Fund committee.

The new races, coupled with races on the state and county fair circuit, are expected to provide purses of more than $3.5 million for colts and fillies this year.

Horse-drawn sleigh rides are popular by day or night at Mount Snow, the winter sports resort in Vermont.

Dining, Dancing Are Big Parts of Ski Scene

By MICHAEL STRAUSS
Special to The New York Times

WEST DOVER, Vt.—There is a trend at some Eastern ski areas that might well be called "après, après, ski."

It's a program of keeping patrons entertained long after the lifts have stopped humming and the skis have been tucked away for the night.

In recent years it has become common practice for enthusiasts to stop at a cafe in their trek between ski area and ski lodge for some refreshments. In Europe, this activity usually is referred to as "tea time," although something stronger than tea frequently is served.

At some resorts, ski instructors, who are also musicians, perform for an hour or so in base lodges after the day's final runs. But skiers usually seek post-session entertainment elsewhere.

In this southern Vermont community, a major drive was undertaken last winter to keep customers busy light on the premises—until well into the night. Put into service was the Snow Mountain Inn—a part of the area's huge complex—as a discotheque. It is now known as "Le Disco."

Situated a short walk from the lifts, "Le Disco" can accommodate about 800. Has it been popular? Last Saturday, for example, more than 1,400 purchased tickets for $1 each. On weekdays, there is no charge.

Skiers wriggle and contort (mostly to rock music) on three dance floors to music played by a disk jockey stationed on a small platform overlooking the dance area. The music comes through clear and loud—with the emphasis on loud.

Officials at Mount Snow, however, are not concentrating their "après, après" sights on just dancing. All-night parties, six-week class students gather in the base lodge to discuss lessons and procedures with instructors. At least twice a week, movies are offered in the same room for a nominal charge. Even twilight and night horse-drawn sled rides are available.

"I feel giving customers something to do after dinner helps win friends," said Alan Fleischman, the young director of the Mount Snow resort. "I'm convinced many skiers—particularly the young ones—aren't completely happy just sitting in front of a fireplace at night swapping stories."

The après-apres ski theme, of course, is new only by major ski area standards. Catskill Mountain hotels in New York, such as the Concord, Grossinger, the Nevele and the Pines, among others, have incorporated plenty of live entertainment for their guests. However, these resorts boast only tiny ski centers while featuring a big assortment of other sports.

Ski, Skate, Serve
In Pennsylvania's Poconos, Ennis Wagner, aware that artificial snow had made resort hotels more attractive in the winter, installed a chairlift and slopes at his Mount Airy Lodge a few years ago. He also offers seven indoor tennis courts and an artificial ice skating rink. During recreational skiing's early years, it was generally felt that any program even remotely resembling après, après ski, was foolish. Possibly looking back to the days before rope tows when skiers had to climb slopes in order to descend them, operators felt their patrons were too tired to engage in any after-dinner activities.

By the mid-1950's, it became increasingly evident this was not true. Soon après ski moved into the scene. Within a decade, enterprising ski operators—at Stratton and Magic Mountain in Vermont among others—began making major efforts to have their patrons enjoy night life in their base lodges.

In recent years, the new idea has begun to blossom. In Vermont Smugglers Notch has its own Snow Snake Lounge, where patrons are entertained up to 2 A.M. Nearby Bolton Valley offers similar "on-premises" possibilities.

It's a throwback to about 20 years ago when ski pros at Mad River Glen at Waitsfield, Vt., entertained guests. For an admission charge of 50 cents, skiers were treated to pantomime performances rendered while recordings were being played in a 100-year-old barn. Guests brought their own drinks. Undoubtedly, they needed them. The barn was unheat-

Friday's Fight

Ashe Rated No. 1 at Net, Connors 2d

By CHARLES FRIEDMAN
Arthur Ashe, on the basis of his 1975 performance, is the world's No. 1 player, the two leading tennis magazines agree in their February issues.

In the absence of any official world rankings, the annual selections by Tennis and World Tennis are considered authoritative by most followers of the sport.

Both listed Jimmy Connors, Bjorn Borg of Sweden and Manuel Orantes of Spain in that order behind Ashe. But they differed on the rest of the top 10.

Connors was the overwhelming choice for No. 1 last year, when he won the Australian, Wimbledon and United States titles. But he lost in the finals of all three in 1975—to John Newcombe in Australia, Ashe at Wimbledon and Orantes at Forest Hills.

Ashe won 9 of 29 tournaments in 1975, including the World Championship Tennis crown. Connors took 9 of 18, his best victories coming in the United States Indoors and the Volvo International. He played Ashe only once, at Wimbledon, because for most of the year they were on different circuits. But generally Ashe went against tougher opposition than Connors did.

Chris Evert and Billie Jean King were listed as first and second among the women by both magazines. Mrs. King is now retired from singles competition.

World Tennis placed Martina Navratilova third and Evonne Goolagong of Australia fourth, whereas Tennis reversed their positions.

For the first time, Tennis compiled a world junior ranking list of boys and girls 18 years and under. It chose as Nos. 1 Chris Lewis of New Zealand and Natasha Chmyrva of the Soviet Union, who gave Miss Evert a hard fight in Houston this week.

Howard Schoenfeld was No. 2 and Beth Norton No. 5. They are the United States champions.

In the 45-and-over senior class, Tennis had Frank Sedgman of Australia as the world's best. He was followed by Torben Ulrich of Denmark, Sven Davidson of Sweden and Pancho Segura and Tom Brown of the United States.

Wood, Field & Stream: Sound of the Beagle Is Sweet

By NELSON BRYANT
Special to The New York Times

WEST TISBURY, Mass.—The crying of beagles on the spoor of a cottontail rabbit in some dense thicket is a sweet sound to me, made sweeter, perhaps, because a beagle was the first dog I had as a hunting companion.

There were two beagles in my boyhood, but, alas, neither was mine. One was a bitch named Trixie, who belonged to Forrest Bosworth in North Tisbury, and on Saturdays I would walk the two miles to his house to borrow her for hunting. The other was a venerable fellow named Spot, owned by Albert West, a school chum who lived in Chilmarr, six miles away. Sometimes the weekend, I would ride on Spot to Albert's house and stay overnight to hunt the next day.

Both animals were good. Trixie was more aggressive, while Spot, in his advancing years, often substituted cunning for exertion.

One of Spot's tricks in the twilight of his days was to circle the clump of bull briers, into which he had driven a rabbit, to wait for the creature to emerge on the other side. "No need," he seemed to be thinking as he waited, "to tear up my ears and tail."

The last winter we hunted with Spot he often irritated us by refusing to come when we called, and once in a while we spanked him for his stubbornness. That summer I came upon him sleeping in a mottled patch of sunlight on Albert's barn floor and called to him, but he didn't respond. I walked up and touched his head and he lurched upright with a startled look. It was then I realized that he was stone deaf.

blacktop snakes 1,061 miles from the Tijuana border to the tip of the peninsula at Cabo San Lucas. It was built by the Mexican Government to unlock the primeval land for the average American tourist. Before the asphalt, most of the shoreline, mountains and desert country were inaccessible except to boats, small private planes, or four-wheel-drive vehicles. Only several thousand braved the dirt road each year. Today the peninsula is alive with projects ranging from camper-trailer parks and guesthouses to the chain of grand El Presidente hotels. All are being built to exploit the magnificent beaches, lagoons, rocky coasts, mountains and fishing resorts. Last year more than 2 million cars, campers and buses used the Carretera Numero Uno and as many are expected this year. Although the pavement sometimes narrows to only 19 feet and has neither shoulders nor guard rails on mountainsides above sheer 3,000-foot drops, drivers can make the trip from Tijuana to Cabo San Lucas in about three days. Pre-pavement travel time was seven or eight days, except for Parnelli Jones and a few other off-road racers.

Until two years ago most Bajaenos knew Americans only as those "crazy gringos" who would drive across their land at breakneck speeds during the Mexican 1000 Off Road Race. Former Indianapolis 500 winner Parnelli Jones was the reigning champion. With his heavy-gauge, roll-barred Bronco, he made the Ensenada to La Paz run in just over 14 hours. No one was faster until the pavement. The pavement killed the race.

The STP decals, along with those of Montessa, Valvoline, Honda, Saab, Harley Davidson using Baja as their unofficial testing ground, are now fading on the windows of Mrs. Espinoza's Cantina in El Rosario, a small fishing pueblo on the Pacific Coast 152 miles from Ensenada. The race is over, but in honor of the man who sped down the coastal sand dunes, up over the Pacific mountain range and down into her valley in a little over 90 minutes, Mrs. Espinoza still has "Parnelli Jones Taco" on her menu.

Two years ago, Baja California was a land of miniature fishing villages and empty desert, accessible only to those willing to brave the dust and ditches of a one-lane washboard road. The new Carretera Numero Uno has changed all that, luring Americans by the millions.

Mrs. Espinoza is the mayor and postmaster of El Rosario, an adobe village of several hundred families. She laments the passing of the Mexican 1000.

"When the roads are no good, the people who came here were good. When the roads are good, the people who come here are not so good," she said. "Our village has changed very much now, too. Mexicans from the mainland are coming to make money from the tourists."

El Rosario has grown by several hundred in the last two years. Bajaenos who worked the cattle, sea, or land now work the visitors from the north. Mrs. Espinoza no longer operates her hand-pump, glass-jar gas stand in her front yard. The village has its own government-owned Pemex station now and a super mercado (supermarket) which shines its fluorescent lights into the desert until the pueblo's diesel-driven electric generator winds down at 10 P.M. After that Mrs. Espinoza's kerosene lanterns are lighted to attract late travelers.

At about 10:15 a tall heavy-set tourist with fisherman's cap knocked on the screen door while walking in.

"Do you all have showers here?" he asked.

Finishing up the dishes in the family and restaurant kitchen, Mrs. Espinoza did not look at him.

"Not hot showers, señor—warm." Not hesitating, the man answered: "That'll be just fine ma'am."

With his acceptance of her modest accommodations, she dried her hands and smiled at him. She walked over to a drawer with a string of keys attached to each other.

"Our hacienda is muy rustica, señor. Rustic. But the rooms are clean. We have no towels, though. For some reason you Americanos love our towels. Why, I do not know." She walked out the back door with a lantern, refusing his money until morning, and led him to a group of small one-room adobe buildings.

ter"), one of my most useful expressions. I sense with an accurate foreboding that the day's transactions will all take place in Greek and hope that my slim supply will be equal to the demand.

The taxi drivers express Ochi No. 2 when I approach them at intersections, and there is not a bus in sight as I turn down King Constantine's Avenue on the mile walk to the little shop in the Plaka district where I have been told the pitchers "perhaps exist." The wind is strong in my face from the west. Ahead of me the Acropolis rears sharp outlines against blowing clouds. The Goddess is out of town for the winter, and her great residence stands empty, shadowy and austere. In spite of the wind I am glad I am walking in that direction.

The tiny dark shop, when I find it, turns out to be not much warmer than the street. I like it, though, a basic stuff shop all hung about with bird cages, mousetraps, stove pipes, pots, lanterns, hoes, swinging trays, "briliks" for brewing coffee, copper retsina cups, brooms, skewers, baskets . . . and tin olive oil pitchers. I also like Mitsos, the intense young owner who promises that I can have six dozen "immediately," which, though it means "later," is not half as bad news as "now," which means "much later."

He barks terse commands at his assistants, two Levantine pirates (played by a slightly older and a slightly younger Omar Sharif), and they rush up attic and down cellar to no avail and finally out to the street on a frantic search. I compose myself on a chair in the back of the shop and watch half of Athens file through to buy bird cages. But I am not forgotten. From time to time Mitsos, who looks like a Venetian prince, sends me an encouraging smile, and after an hour he even brings a tiny Greek coffee with a glass of water on a tray.

After another hour I am summoned to the back room. There in proud effulgent rows are my pitchers and even two cartons for the packing. I demand stronger cartons, and the pirates again rush off. Mitsos and I count the pitchers four times, interrupting each other and getting a different answer each time. On the fifth count there are six dozen.

The pirates reappear, beaming, with old but strong cartons, and amid customers they essay to do the packing. I am afraid the cartons aren't big enough and hover with advice but am ignored. In the end everything fits. To the inch. We are jubilant. Business

Gracious Elegance

An almost forgotten art is alive and flourishing at a great, new Miami Beach Oceanfront Hotel.

We carry on very old-fashioned ideas about what makes a hotel "great." Ideas that you will find at only a very few of the world's finest hotels. Like personal attention, exclusiveness, genuine hospitality and true privacy.

A lot more refinement, and a lot less bustle and bustle. A beautiful alternative to sharing the nice things in life with sightseers and conventioners.

Spaciousness, too... plenty of it to enjoy uncrowded tennis, elegant dining in celebrated Bernard's, sunning, relaxation... and an appropriate place of honor at our Yacht Club for your proud craft.

And, we will give you an apartment for the cost of a room at other establishments. Gracious elegance lives again.

BERT J. DUNPHY

American vacationer torn between the pull of the Old World and the lure of Stateside Bicentennial celebrations need not despair. He can eat his cake and have it, sampling the wide range of international events scheduled throughout the continent. Here's a sampling of some.

Commemoration of American Bicentennial will be among the themes in the 1976 St. Patrick's Parade in Dublin on March 17. At the height of the parade commemorates the national feast day will Irish-American ties. One will representing the Boston Tea Party will be followed by a parade of marchers from the Boston Emerald Society. More than 100,000 people are expected to participate in the parade.

This is "Welcome America Wales, and it gives the Welsh community to point out that not Thomas Jefferson of Welsh descent so were 18 other signers of the Declaration of Independence. Spectacles associated with these historic ties with the United States have been worked out for Americans and are available from the Tourist Authority, 680 Fifth Avenue, New York 10019.

A 41-page brochure, entitled "Franco-American Friendship," is being issued by the French Tourist Office, 610 Fifth Avenue, New York 10020. The publication contains more than 120 towns and cities in France scheduling events to celebrate America's independence. Performing artists appearing in the Bicentennial will include the Philharmonic, Harvard-Radcliffe Musicum, New York Philharmonic and the Boston Symphony.

Victor Borge, the Danish pianist, will be the guest of honor at the largest July celebration outside the United States at Rebild National Park, Denmark's Queen Margrethe and other members of the Danish royal family will join some 40,000 Americans in a salute to the United States.

The founding fathers of the United States, all of British descent, are the subject of a new film, "The Founding Fathers," which shames of famous Americans and their ancestors, including George Washington, will be in the tourist spotlight this year. Sulgrave, near Banbury, where the Washingtons lived before moving to Virginia in 1656, is furnished with Elizabethan and 18th-century antiques and has a Gilbert Stuart portrait of the first President over the fireplace. Franklin's house in London, at 36 Craven Street, is open to visitors and is occupied by a society devoted to Anglo-American understanding. As a final flourish, the City of London plans to adopt as its 1976 theme, "The 200th Anniversary of the Declaration of Independence." In London a Bicentennial exhibition called "1776—the British Fight for America" will be held in the Greenwich Maritime Museum.

Scotland—The Edinburgh Festival is inviting dozens of American musicians and soloists, including the New York Philharmonic and the Alwyn Nikolai Dance Company, to participate in next summer's programs.

Luxembourg—A Washington's Birthday commemoration ceremony will be held at the United States Military Cemetery in Hamm (where Gen. George Patton is buried).

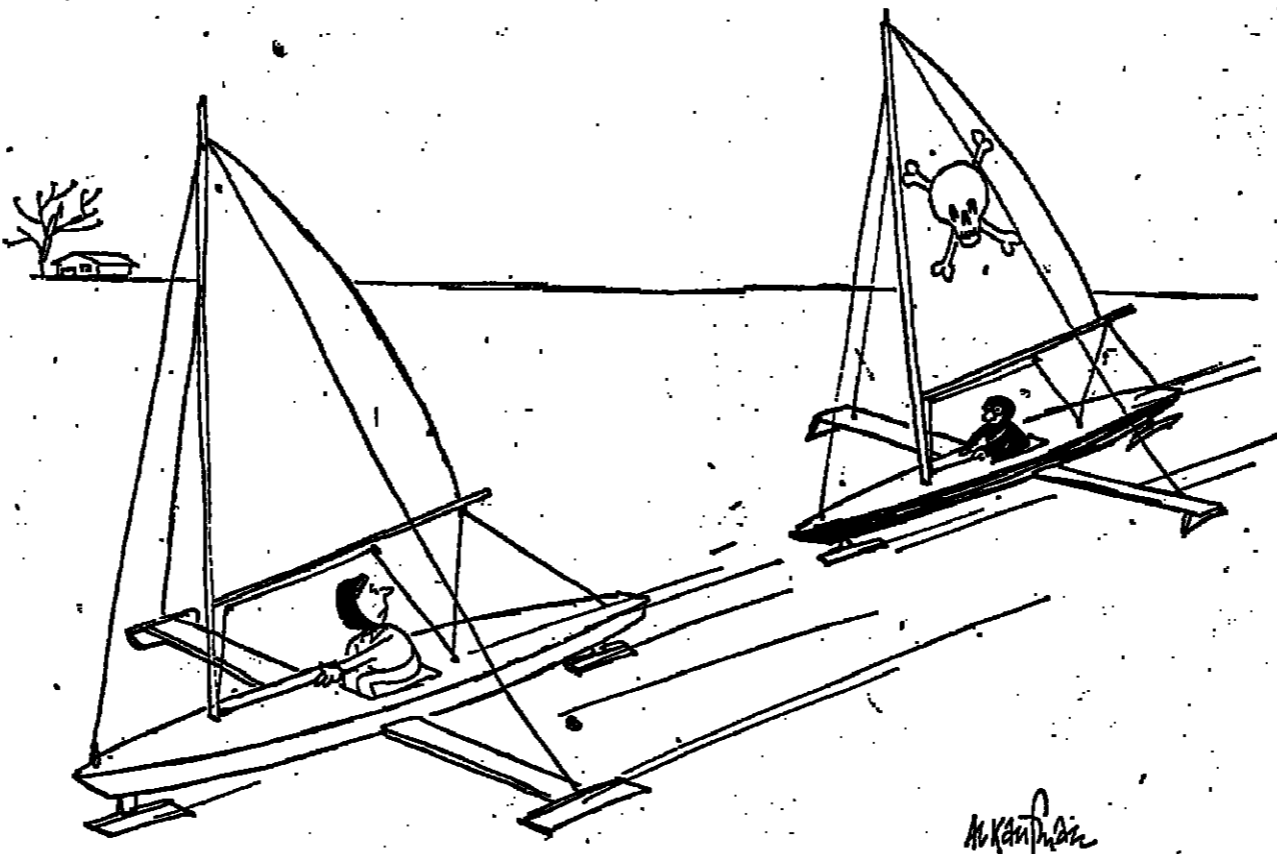

West Germany—Among Bicentennial events: a convocation at St. Paul's Cathedral in Frankfurt sometime in spring; the presentation of two TV documentaries, one on the American Indian and the other on the American cowboy; an exhibit entitled "The Rhine and the Hudson" at the Dusseldorf Academy; Cleveland Orchestra concerts in Bonn and Berlin on Sept. 18-19 and Sept. 26; the New York Philharmonic and the Boston Symphony on tour this summer.

Finland—A series of "American Days" will be set aside during the year to commemorate Finnish-American friendship during the year.

The Netherlands—Two major exhibits are planned in The Hague—one on Frontier America and the other on American artists in the 1930's. A Holland Festival with American exhibits will be held in The Hague, Amsterdam and Rotterdam in June.

THE HINDENBURG

The Lakehurst Naval Air Station in New Jersey, scene of the Hindenburg disaster of 1937, is getting some proper backwash in the way of publicity from the new Universal film about the ill-fated German dirigible, and a camaign is being launched to establish a museum on the site. A Navy spokesman at the installation, roughly 60 miles southwest of New York, said hour-long tours of the facility are conducted by appointment for school groups and the like on Wednesdays and for the general public on Sundays between 1 and 4 P.M. "We point out the general area of the accident," the spokesman said, "but there isn't much else to see. The mooring mast where the Hindenburg burned after her trans-Atlantic flight is no longer here. The main attraction is the giant hanger that housed the big airships of the 1920's and '30's." The drive to establish a museum at Lakehurst is headed by Vice Adm. Charles E. Rosendahl, who is commanding officer of the facility and landing officer on the scene when the Hindenburg burned with a loss of 36 lives. One plan, currently before Congress calls for the Government to set aside some 13 acres at Lakehurst as the prospective museum site. Lakehurst is now a Navy air-testing facility and a center for engineering research and development.

The installation is approximately 10 miles west of Toms River (Exit 88 on the Garden State Parkway).

MOLAR CITY

Algodones is a town that is really putting teeth into Mexican tourism. The community of 2,500 inhabitants, not far from Tijuana on the Mexican-California border, is attracting so many Americans seeking discount dental work that it is called Molar City by northwesterners and El Pueblo de los Dentistas by Mexicans. According to Hughes Air West's Sundancer magazine, the visitor approaching Algodones from the United States is confronted with a row of no fewer than six dental offices within 600 feet of the border. Among the signs gracing the facades are "English Spoken" and "Open Seven Days a Week," and some of the dentists employ as many as 20 staff assistants. As an example of the savings the bargain-hunters find in dentures, one firm advertises full uppers and lowers for $160, a price that compares with a fee of $500 for a similar job in the United States. The American Dental Association confirmed that it has received numbers of complaints from its members about the Mexican price-cutting, but says there is little it can do to halt the practice. "Border-hopping for dental purposes is quite common in the Texas-California area," a spokesman at the A.D.A.'s Chicago headquarters said. "We hear of them mainly through dentists on the American side who report increasing numbers of cases in which they have to correct dental problems resulting from bargain-basement treatment south of the border."

Letters: High Cost Of Dining

To the Editor: On Christmas Day, I had what was definitely the most expensive meal ever, surpassing in cost the $4,000 meal enjoyed in Paris by The Times food critic Craig Clairborne and his colleague. Our meal was prepared for a party of five persons at the Holiday Inn at LaGuardia Airport.

The high cost was due to the theft of our car from the motel parking lot while we were dining. Let the traveler (and diner) beware. Mrs. H. FRUM Queens

MARBLEHEAD VS. GLOUCESTER

To the Editor: I read with interest the article, "1776 and All That: A Backward Glance" (Travel Section, Dec. 28) and found it a most interesting capsule résumé of the year's events.

I was filled with admiration for author Sol Stember until I came to the paragraph headed Oct. 18: "He [Howe] is delayed for a while by Col. John Glover and his Gloucester fishermen. . . . Gloucester indeed: Does the author not know that Glover's men were recruited by him in his hometown of Marblehead? And also that they were instrumental in rescuing the Army in Brooklyn? Also, that they took Washington and his army across the Delaware?"

Wherever small boat handling was needed, especially in dangerous and adverse conditions, Glover's "amphibious regiment" was called upon. They were truly the pride of Marblehead and still are.

Mrs. SAMUEL CHAMBERLAIN Marblehead, Mass. [Author Stember replies: Like the Marblehead men themselves, Mrs. Chamberlain of Marblehead is right on target.]

MOVIES ALOFT

To the Editor: I realize that many passengers on long flights like to watch whatever film is being shown. Many of us, however, do not wish to do so, and for us movies

GOURMET TOURS

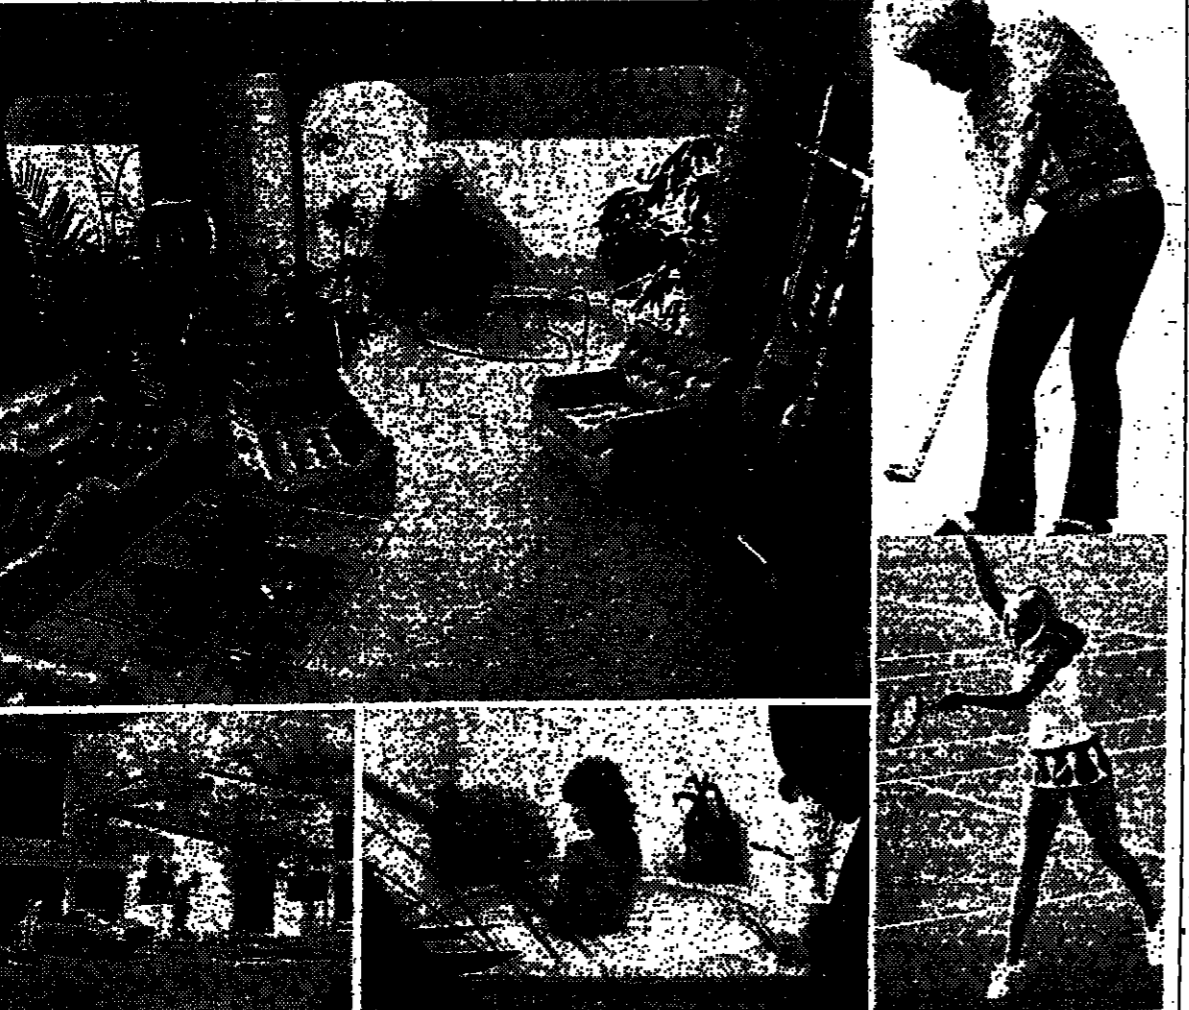

An eight-day tour, called "Going Gourmet with Simone Beck," will take participants to the French Riviera estate of the co-author (with Julia Child) of the book, "Mastering the Art of French Cooking." There, four members will reside at the Domaine de Bramatan in Chateaufort de Grasse and attend daily cooking classes conducted by the author. The tour will leave New York on Feb. 14 and return Feb. 22, and the all-inclusive price is $960 per person. For details, write Humbert Travel Service, 610 Fifth Avenue, New York 10020 (212-489-5600).

A tour of the wine regions of France will be highlighted in a gourmet tour conducted by Canterbury Travel of New York in association with Sam Aaron, president of the New York wine dealer, Sherry-Lehman, Inc. A number of three-star restaurants will be included in the tour which will extend from May 20-28 and the accommodations will be limited to 25 connoisseurs, with prices starting at $2,500 per person, plus air fare. Canterbury's address is P.O. Box 159, Kent, Conn. 06757.

TRICIA BROOKS

YOU know you're in New England, even southern New England, when drugstores turn into "apothecaries," road signs say "carriageway" and "thickly settled the American eagle appears here but in the sky—on wall-bedsprads, over bars, fireplaces otopos.

know it most of all by the a of inns. A real New England sometimes as hard to find as a glass. But today in New England—and especially in Connecticut—by any other name often it to be a tea room, a motel, house, a boarding house, a bar, a cafe or a coffee shop. Excuse me, please.

searching for an authentic inn, it always rely on the official side. One guide lists an establishment call Ye Olde Tavern as a "old New England-style inn." It's a medium-size middle-class house, vintage 1910, long since downhill, with linoleum runners he halls and stairs. In the South west, it would properly be classified as a tourist home offering rooms night.

through the maze of candlewick bedsprads, fake carriage spread-eagle draperies, cut-glass fishes awash with cottage cheese urfelt of lumpy Indian pudding, n occasionally get a glimpse real thing, captured in the words of Johnson: "There is nothing in the world so much happiness is produced good taverns or inn."

real old-style inn is a trip into a place living at history ctually a part of it, more often situated in a setting of wooded or a village of historic significance from the maddening superhighway inn's pace is usually leisureed, more for foliage watching than for a writer who lives necticut, has previously written n in Japan, Denmark, England o York State.

The Roger Sherman shows signs of having been played with rather extensively over the centuries, with numerous additions and changes, though the original house remains basically intact. The 26-inch-wide oak floorboards found in parts of the house belong to the earliest period of Connecticut architecture. "During one of the reconstruction jobs," Montgomery says, "the workmen demanded extra compensation because the hard wood in the original house kept breaking their tools."

The house has undergone numerous metamorphoses over the years. It was first a minister's home. The Rev. Justus Mitchell kept his Bible in the cupboard above the fireplace in what is now the inn's bar. His wife was a niece of Roger Sherman, a Connecticut judge and Senator who was the only man to sign all four of the nation's major documents: the Articles of Association, the Declaration of Independence, the Articles of Confederation and the Constitution.

From home to select prep school for boys to a New Yorker's weekend retreat, the house first became an inn, known as the Holmewood, in 1926. The latest change came six years ago with a trioka management and an entirely new cuisine with a decisively continental imprint. Specialties include sweetbreads with sauce Bearnaise, Sauerbraten, veal Cordon Bleu and breast of guinea hen sous cloche. Prices range from $5.50 to $10.75.

There are five moderate-size dining rooms; the quietest one (none is exactly raucous, which contributes to the inn's charm) is part of the original house and has Tiffany windows and a fireplace lined with blue-and-white Dutch tiles. In warm weather the best place to eat is outside, under towering pines on a flagstone terrace or on the spacious front porch. It's a favorite lunch stop for local lawyers and politicians.

With eight guest rooms in the old inn, five more in an annex and six apartments, there are not too many overnight options, so reservations are essential. Rates run $16 to $21 for a single, $21 to $27 double and $30 for a triple suite. Only one double has a double bed, but most have television sets, which seem strangely out of character. All the rooms are decorated with oddments of old pieces, many in the style of Early Attic. There are huge overstuffed chairs, gilded eagle mirrors, floral patterns everywhere. The double rooms are large enough for visiting with extra chairs and tables arranged in sitting-room style. Three in the main house have fireplaces, as do four in the annex.

Though the dining room is the inn's major attraction, an overnight or weekend stay can certainly be restful. A nature center is across the road, with pond and trails sprawling over a large woody landscape, and several modern churches are a short walk up the road. The only really lively times at the inn are Friday and Saturday nights when the piano pounding and singing emanating from the old parlor, now the bar, are enough to make old Pastor Mitchell do a few quick spins in his grave.

The inn overlooks the desultory Silvermine River. In warm weather one wall of the Step Down Room opens to the terrace, and guests can eat outside while watching swans and ducks gliding past.

Four buildings form the tavern group: a country store, the old mill, a coach house and the tavern proper. There are only 10 guest rooms, decked out in a Colonial theme, with two doubles especially appealing with canopy beds and balconies that overlook the river. Rates for all but the balcony rooms range from $16 single to $25 double. The balcony rooms are $28.

Miss Abigail, a pioneer-garbed mannequin, greets visitors at the bar and delights the bands of children who frequent the tavern with their parents. Abigail is said to be the only woman permitted by old state law to stand within three feet of a bar. If that really were true once, it's not anymore.

Silvermine attracts families that enjoy eating in front of the crackling open fire in the Fireplace Room. The Step Down Room, with an uneven brick floor, wrought-iron chandeliers, burnished and gleaming antique wooden sideboards, is cooler but cozier. The Americana fare is familyish, too, with an emphasis on hearty home-cooked soups, hot and sticky inn-baked buns, rolls and desserts. I've found that by staying with standards like chicken pot pie and avoiding moules and other newer additions to the menu one is on safer culinary ground. Prices range from $6.25 to $12 (for a complete shore dinner).

STONEHENGE, Ridgefield. Off U.S. 7 between Wilton and Danbury. Tel: 203-438-6511. The fame of the late chef-owner Albert Stockli's kitchen brought gourmets and Broadway notables flocking to this rambling old country house on the outer rim of exurbia. The two new owners, David Davis and Douglas Seville, and their Swiss chef, Ans Benderer, are conscious of Stockli's standards and seem to be upholding them. I found on a recent visit the same crisp table service, sparkling crystal and fresh flowers on the table. The continental menu is still tuned to the seasons, with venison, pheasant and other game in fall, fresh brook trout in mousseline sauce in spring (from the well-stocked pond on the wooded grounds) and a dizzying assortment in between.

The dining room is smallish, non-nonsense in a pretty Provencal way, and you may, as I did recently, discover Cloris Leachman at the next table. There is the Druid Room, adjacent, which on the basis of size might better be dubbed the Elf Room, with its low-

What's Do...
POCONOS THE HEAR COUNTRY

What's Doing in ASPEN and VAIL

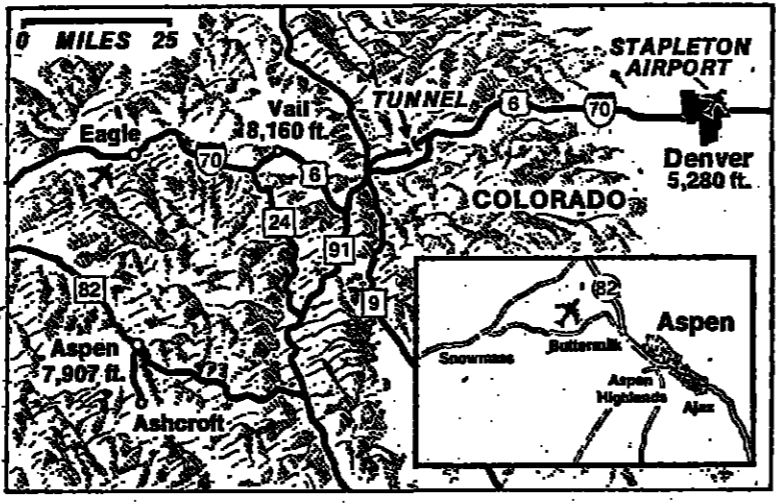

By GRACE LICHTENSTEIN

COMPARISONS—Comparing Aspen and Vail is like asking a wine lover which he likes better: Château Lafite-Rothschild or Château d'Yquem. The two wines come from the same general area, yet taste and look completely different; so do the two grand cru skiing areas of Colorado. Snow and high prices are two of the few things Vail and Aspen, the older of the two, is American skiing epitomized: an old mining town with Victorian gingerbread houses that has been turned into one of the neatest, liveliest resorts in the world. Vail is the younger, more start: a total winter resort community created out of wilderness 13 years ago and deliberately designed to look like a Swiss village. The original Vail village and the futuristic Lion's Head section a half-mile away. The first resembles something out of Disneyland; the second is a bit 1984-ish. Both Aspen and Vail have distinct ambiances. Aspen suggests Greenwich Village, writers, T.M. It has been called "Woodstock West," populated by counterculture writers and John Denver-type celebrities. Vail, which suggests Short Hills, engineers and Dale Carnegie. It has been described as "plastic Bavaria," populated by loud Texans and Gerry Ford-type Midwesterners. Both reputations are exaggerated, although Vail skiers do lean toward the straighter and more courteous than Aspen people. Aspen's visitors tend to be more sophisticated and more casual. The most important point, however, is that both places are superb ski areas for every type of skier from beginner to expert. The weather is usually ideal at both. Each is so popular it's often hard to get reservations. If you have two weeks' vacation, consider spending one at each resort. (They are a half-hour drive apart, with regular bus service between. Only one week? Don't try to do both areas. They are too big to appreciate in a quick stay.)

GETTING THERE—This can be the rough part. Most trips begin and end on a Saturday. Thus Saturday is the best day to ski—no crowds. But arriving on Saturday can mean a hellish hour in the jammed baggage claim area at Stapleton Airport in Denver, gateway to both resorts. If available, arrive at Stapleton any other day. Or plan to stay overnight in Denver (altitude, 5,200 feet) before going into the mountains (Vail and Aspen are at 8,000 feet), especially if you suffer from jet lag, or have trouble adjusting to high altitude. The Stapleton Plaza is a good airport hotel (from $33, double). From Denver, the simplest way to Vail or Aspen is by Continental Trailways bus, which leaves at regular intervals from the airport. Call Trailways at Stapleton (303-987-1212) for a seat in advance. You cannot reserve through Trailways offices anywhere else. Reservations must be claimed a half hour before departure. The ride to Vail takes about two hours and costs $33.35 one way; Aspen, five hours, $144.40. You can also fly to Aspen on Continental airline but this is a bit silly in the case of Vail, since the airport at Eagle is 35 miles from the resort. Both Aspen Airways (pressurized Convair 440's or 580's) and Rocky Mountain Airways (unpressurized twin Otters) serve Aspen's handsome, convenient new airport. The flight takes about 30 minutes on Aspen Airways, 45 minutes on Rocky Mountain. If the weather is bad, the planes may not fly. Coloradoans seem to prefer the little Rocky Mountain twin Otters. My experience with Rocky Mountain has been unhappy. I've learned not to trust their printed schedule of Aspen flights. However, Rocky Mountain runs many more flights than Aspen Airways. The one-way fare to Aspen on either airline is $31; about $10 less if you buy a stand-by ticket (not a bad idea in midweek). Only Rocky Mountain flies to Eagle (for Vail). The one-way fare is $22 plus $1 for insurance to the resort. Aspen Airways in Denver: 303-398-3744; Rocky Mountain Airways in Denver: 303-398-3996. Unless you get withdrawal symptoms when you're away from steering wheel, too long, it is not necessary to rent a car. The drive from Denver to Vail can be snowy and scary. To Aspen, it's the same, only longer. And both resorts have free, frequent buses to take skiers around town and to the lifts. However, car rental agencies have offices at Stapleton, Aspen and Vail.

ACCOMMODATIONS—Visitors may book lodging through an airline, a travel agent or on their own. Airline package deals are convenient but not cheaper than a skier making his own arrangements can work out. Trans World Airlines package to Aspen or Vail from New York, including round-trip air fare, round-trip bus fare from Denver, seven nights lodging (no meals) and a lift ticket for six days, will come to about $400 up, depending on the lodge or condominium included. For someone making arrangements independently, the easiest way to find accommodations is to call the central reservation phones: in Aspen, 303-923-4000; in Vail, 303-476-5677. Aspen has some 95 places to stay, Vail about 50. Groups of four to eight people would do well to rent a monthbedroom condominium, which can be more comfortable and just as convenient as a lodge. High season condominium rates (now through April 2 in Vail, April 11 in Aspen) run from about $100 to $130 a day for a three-bedroom (six-bed) apartment. Some have saunas, heated swimming pools and other amenities—ask what you're getting for your money. If you don't have a car, aim for a condo or lodge within walking distance of the center of town. Lodge and hotel rates in both towns run between $25 and $40 a person per day, without meals. In Aspen, I like the funky remodeled Victorian look of the venerable Hotel Jerome ($162 for seven nights); the heated pool and big rooms of the Continental Inn ($211), although sometimes it's a little too bustling with tour groups, and the hearthside coziness of the Fireside Lodge ($169, including breakfast). These rates include a lift ticket for six days. In Vail, I recommend the Mark ($206), a super-modern, luxuriously appointed hotel in Lion's Head, and the Manor Vail Lodge ($185). I am less sure about the Lodge at Snowmass ($206), a combination of hotel rooms and apartments that includes President Ford's condominium. It is perfectly located in the heart of Vail, but indifferently managed and overpriced. Advice: make your trip to either resort during the cheap, snowed-out low season in April. The snow is usually just as good as in February.

CONDITIONS AND WEATHER—Western snow is as fluffy, dry and reliable as the travel brochures say it is. Aspen and Vail weather is more often than not sunny, calm and from 34 to 40 degrees, except in January when it can get cold, and in March and April, when the temperature can go as high as 60. In these two months skiers should guard against sunburn by wearing the face with a sun-screen cream and wearing sunglasses. For daily reports, check local radio or TV, your lodge or the central resort phone number. Or call these Denver numbers for recorded reports from all over the state: 303-693-2201 for snow conditions, 303-630-1515, weather. Incidentally, Colorado ski reports are honestest to a fault. When Aspen calls "fair to good," an Easterner accustomed to being misled by New England optimism would dub "good to excellent." Colorado is spoiled because it expects perfect conditions, and usually gets them.

THE SLOPES—Aspen calls itself the largest skiing facility in North America; Vail calls itself the largest single mountain resort. In any case, skiers will never be bored. Each area has hundreds of miles of slopes, trails, glades and beginner hills. The full-day adult lift ticket costs $11 and there is hardly a reduction for a week-long pass, but it's worth it. Having tried the Northeast, Europe and the West, I think Vail is the best designed mountain I've skied. The gondolas and chairlifts lead to slopes so cleverly contoured you can ski from one side of the vast hill to the other and back in a day without ever taking the same run twice. And just when you think you've seen all of Vail, you discover the "back bowls" on the other side of the mountain—powder basins served by their own lift. Vail is primarily an intermediate mountain (Ramshorn, Simba and Lodgepole are among my favorite long, wide runs) but most of the bowls are for experts. However, both the Game Creek and Northeast bowls have novice runs, so even the learner can get the feel of novel skiing. Among the expert runs, Prima and Riva Ridge are justly famous. The latest innovation at Vail is the Children's Mountain at Eagle's Nest (take the Lion's Head gondola) with a snow plow, a smaller counselor to take care of the little ones. Also new: nature signs pointing out trees and wildlife along Lost Boy trail in the Game Creek bowl. While Vail is one gigantic mountain, Aspen is four of the ones: Also new: nature signs pointing out trees and wildlife along Lost Boy trail in the Game Creek bowl. While Vail is one gigantic mountain, Aspen is four of the ones: Also new: nature signs pointing out trees and wildlife along Lost Boy trail in the Game Creek bowl. While Vail is one gigantic mountain, Aspen is four of the ones: Also new: nature signs pointing out trees and wildlife along Lost Boy trail in the Game Creek bowl.

NIGHT LIFE—Vail has never seemed particularly lively to me, while Aspen has enough happening at night to keep swingers awake. In Vail, the smaller resort has a bar called the Slope, serving W. C. Fields, Lenzy Bruce and ski promotion shorts on a movie screen, and they're fun. Aspen has reasonably decent live rock music for dancing at the Depot and the Aspen Inn. I also had a great discotheque last year in the basement of the Jerome called the Rampage; this season it's called the Hotel Jerome Nightclub and has been given Western-style décor. The Paragon is a lovely winter-themed art-deco drinking emporium, though the disco music is programmed unattractively. Aspen's three movie houses show good taste in oldies and recent films. The only place I found worth losing sleep over in Vail was a multi-storied barn of a saloon, Gartons, favored by the hip young locals. There's drinking, dancing, old cable cars to sit in and shuffleboard.

SHOPS—Hang onto your credit cards; both towns are full of good clothing, ski equipment and gift shops. Purely subjective favorites in Aspen include Wax 'n' Wicks (the Aspen tree candles make a nice gift and the owner dispenses free apple cider to browsers), L'Equipe (stark French ski wear at low prices) and Mountain AIDS (handknit hats and sweaters). In Vail, there's Gorschik Ltd. (all-around good taste in ski wear and equipment) and Meadowlark at Lion's Head (leather bags, pottery).

FINAL NOTE—Gerald Ford is listed in the current Vail telephone book. John Denver is not listed in the current Aspen telephone book.

RESTAURANTS—There seems to be more good food in Aspen and Vail than in the rest of the mountain states put together, although the prices, to be sure, are on a level with New York's best restaurants unless you like Kentucky Fried Chicken. A word of caution: Beware of outdated reputations. I was disappointed at the Copper Kettle in Aspen, reputed to be one of the greats. On the other hand, I have eaten in the Aspen Inn, a Banquet (typical Aspen décor, with plants, leaded glass and the teller cages from the original bank) for three years running and have enjoyed its continental menu each time. Dinner costs from $6 to $11.75, excluding drinks. Another Aspen favorite is Andre's, for either the best breakfast you ever ate (about $4) or an equally appetizing dinner ($10). Among this year's new crop of eating places, the Arya in the Aspen Inn, is a handsomely decorated, ambitious and tasty ($12). For a cheaper dinner, the Shaft (the specialty is ribs), at about $6, and Little Annie (burgers, chili), for $3, are quite acceptable. In Vail, the Left Bank, despite its kitschy Mona Lisa and Eiffel Tower walls, has fine French food (entrees, $7-$11). The Gashoff Grainshopper Antlers Room features well-prepared game—elk, antelope, venison—$10-$12.50. Less expensive but pleasant are Purcell's (seafood and steak), at $5-$11, and Hanzel and Gretel (steak and omelets), from $4.25. Lion's Head, and the Clock Tower for steak and fish, $10-$12.50, about $6 to $10.50 for dinner. To avoid hunger pains, make reservations early in the day at those restaurants that accept them. At others, eat early or figure on an hour's wait. There is one restaurant that I have never visited but nevertheless deserves special mention. It is Toklat, which is near the Ashcroft Ski Touring Center and a half-hour's drive from Aspen. The atmosphere here is of the mountain wild, complete with a few huskies. There is one sitting a night, beginning with a hospitality hour and complimentary drinks at 6:45 P.M. The prix fixe dinner—$12.60—for which guests must bring their own wine, is at 7:30. After dinner there is poetry reading and storytelling. Reservations must be made six to eight weeks in advance. Call 303-735-7345. Toklat doesn't serve lunch.

LESSONS—The two resorts have three of the finest learn-to-ski programs in the West. All teach the graduated length method, which has a rank turkey on intermediate slopes on five-foot skis by the end of a week. Group lessons at Vail: $12 full day; private lessons, $17 an hour for one, $25 for two. At Aspen Ski School (Ajax, Buttermilk, Snowmass) and Aspen Highlands Ski School (particularly recommended), group lessons are $12 full day; private, $20 an hour.

APRES SKI—In Vail, Donovan's bar is a favorite. In Aspen, my personal choices are the bar at Highlands (live music, pitchers of beer, dancers in ski boots), the Hotel Jerome bar (especially popular with Aspen residents) and the outdoor beer hall at the end of the main mall at Snowmass.

Blacktop Bid for the Tourist: How the Pavement Came to Baja

Mrs. Espinoza has become defensive since the pavement. Before, people were grateful for anything she had: lobster omelets cooked on the wood stove, clean sheets, conversation in English and water at any temperature. Today she has heard too many Americans in their "aloja" shirts and Tony Lama boots comparing her facilities with those of Holiday Inns.

For 50 miles south of El Rosario, Highway 1 moves in from the Pacific Coast to the wild central desert of Baja. It is the least populated area of the peninsula. The road meanders through granite hills and lava plains with scattered wild groves of tree-size yucca plants, cacti and crio cactus and the unique "boojum" tree—a weird thorny plant that looks something like an elephant's trunk, sometimes reaching heights of 60 feet.

This desert, called Vizcaino, has not changed for the most part since described by Father Johann Jakob Baegert in his "Observations in Lower California" (1751-1768): "Everything concerning this country is of such little importance that it is hardly worth the trouble to take a pen and write about it. Of poor shrubs, useless thorn bushes and bare rocks, of piles of sand without water or wood. What shall I, or what can I report?"

There are today a few scattered ranchos and primitive roads, but hardly a smudge from technology except a few wrecked car carcasses—until Santa Ines. Here sits the new Nacional de Mexico El Presidente Catavina, one of five Government-owned resort complexes now open along the highway. Plans call for another six to be built on the peninsula. The Catavina is a luxurious 39-unit hotel with open courtyards, arches, Mexican artifacts, gardens, swimming pool, restaurant, bar, convention rooms and a parking lot hosting a great number of Winnebago, Invaders, Explorers, vans, campers and buses. It is nestled in a canyon of huge boulders strewn about a spring-fed oasis.

At around sunset, when the desert cools rapidly, most of the American camper pilots have traded their motorized homes for 10 Honeywell wall heaters in the Lan Cantina bar where they buy each other hot toddies and swap discomfort stories. A couple with warm beverages in hand joined a group of three near a wall heater.

"Our room is pretty cold. How's yours?" asked a woman wearing a safari-beige pantsuit.

"Too cold for $30 a night, that's for sure," answered a tall bearded man in suede smoking jacket.

Nearby stood a small, tired-looking man wearing chinos. He showed no reaction to the comments; he is used to hearing them. Mario Lazareno, 28, simply refilled their orders. He's the bartender, room clerk, accountant, social host and part-time electrical engineer at El Presidente.

"They just don't realize that they're in the middle of nowhere," said Mario, playing with the rim of his brandy glass. "Everything has to be shipped out here from Ensenada or Tijuana. This is a long trip, and sometimes things run out or things don't work all the time. Everything is imported here: gas, food, drinks, soap, paper—and all of us who work here."

Mario and the 26 other employees have come for the experience of running a luxury "parador" with hopes of being promoted to one of the Mexican Government hotels in a larger city so they can afford to be with their families. Mario spends five days a month in Ensenada with his wife and two daughters.

Before the pavement, the road would meander from one tiny village or family rancho to another. They were populated by a few scattered homesteaders who depended on small wells for their livestock and gardens. There were few cafes south of Espinoza in El Rosario: A traveler would depend on the ranchers for a couple of gallons of gas out of a 50-gallon drum and, for a few pesos, a place at the family table. The new highway bypasses many of these farmhouses now, taking away the extra income and friendly contact with the Americans. Some have deserted their old homes, moved to the road and rebuilt, the Don of Laguna Chapala, for example, 89-year-old Arturo Grosso.

Before the pavement, Rancho Chapala was located 35 miles south of Santa Ines in a valley surrounded by huge granite boulders. The bedrock road wound out of the hills and then suddenly fragmented into dozens of fire tracks of vehicles that had passed before, seeking the surest route through four miles of almost impassable chuckholes and dips of silt as fine as Johnson's Baby Powder. Mexican 1000 drivers compared the experience to having someone dump several tons of brown that the road is not for high-speed driving, but for the economic development of the people. Grosso feels that so far the pavement has brought only inflationary prices and new taxes.

When Grosso came to Laguna Chapala over 30 years ago there was no tax collector, agriculture agent or department of tourism. Grosso didn't want to be interfered with. A good number of the original Baja settlers were those that couldn't deal with too much interference. Among them were a mixture of Indian and European privateers, deserters, soldiers of fortune, filibusters and bandits.

Two hundred miles south of Nueva Rancho Chapala lived one of these, a man of maximum respect, who deserted the German Merchant Marine in 1910. Rather than do time in the brig for striking an officer, engineer Frank Fischer jumped ship in the Gulf of California port of Santa Rosalia. Taking only a bottle of schnapps, Fischer ran into the desert interior. He headed west over the coastal volcanic peaks and down through the lava rock plains called Cuesta del Infernillo, "the grade to hell." Two days and 50 miles later he walked down into a valley filled with over 80,000 date palms, orange trees, grape vines and fig trees. Fischer was befriended by an Indian family in San Ignacio. Within several months he had set up a blacksmithery, learned the language and married a local Indian woman. Eventually there was a motel, La Posada.

Fischer's son, Oscar, one of two boys and four girls, remembered his father as the master mechanic of Baja. "He dropping right off the desert. Today many of these beaches are state or privately owned and have been cemented over, plotted for trailers with camping fees, and parts of the bay are experiencing pollution problems. On the north end of the Bahía de Concepcion sits the Hotel Serenidad where private planes line the driveway and pilots who have come down to get away from it all in the States lounge under palm trees. Before the pavement, those who could afford a plane would fly down to Baja to use one of the hotel's fleet of game-fishing boats, take a shopping trip to nearby Mulegé or just hang out by the fresh-water swimming pool or around the Serenidad's tile bar.

Behind the bar, the hotel owner-manager Don Johnson has mixed feelings about the road: "Some of the romances has gone out of it, that's for sure. The people that have been flyin' down here before the road felt they discovered Baja. You had to fight to get down here and now everybody and his dog is down here. But I can't complain, it means more business for me and everybody here."

Johnson has been in Baja for 13 years. He moved from San Jose, Calif., to the then quiet, tropical picturesque Mulegé with its spring-fed river "to get out of the crazy rat-race up north." Many Americans share Johnson's love for the mango and papaya groves and thatched adobes and narrow dirt streets of this village. So many people love Mulegé that there are now long lines of trailers bearing pick-ups at the town's only Pemex station.

The townspeople are making some adjustments. There is now 24-hour electricity and most of the hotels have bought electric signs. The 200-year-old Vieja Hacienda, with ceiling fans and leather-covered oaken chairs, received a flashing arrow over its entrance soon after the Baja territory became a state in late 1974.

"Now we have five taxes in Mulegé," said Johnson, lighting up another Marlboro. "Now don't get me wrong, I believe in the taxes down here, but it's getting expensive." Johnson is also afraid that the values he came to Baja for—a sense of community, friendships, a simple way of life—may be threatened by this rapid move into the 20th century.

"When I left the States it was getting pretty bad," he said. "Now don't get me wrong, I still love the States and I've kept my citizenship, but it was getting pretty frightening. The crime and all. Here it's different. A girl the other day, a guest, wanted to go shell collecting up the beach and she asked me if she could go alone. At first I didn't understand what she meant. I guess I've been here too long, but she was afraid."

There was a dramatic increase in the crime rate in Baja, the first year after the completion of the road. Bajenos feel that along with the great influx of American tourists came an undesirable element from mainland Mexico to prey on them. Most of the problems have been reported around the larger cities in the north of the peninsula. Near Ensenada there was a rash of robberies last year with one reported killing and another case in which the intended victim killed his assailant. At that time Federal troops were called in to patrol the roads and campsites. No further episodes of violence have been reported. Johnson, on the other hand, has had a few problems from some American visitors.

"Some kids a couple of weeks ago were caught trying to break into the pharmacy in town. If we will have to lock our doors, it will be because of those from the outside, from the mainland or the north, not Mulegé. Even our prisoners are not locked up here."

There are 11 convicts in Mulegé who have been sent to the territorial prison—a huge white-washed building on a hill, the best view in town. None of those doing time are required to live in their cells. Most live and work in town: driving taxis, farming, doing

"The old days of Baja cannot be brought back, anymore changes are on the way: 12 additional air 17 desalination plants for 26 proposed new cities five new deep-water ports... and five Holiday Inn construction work. The only locks in the prison are those to keep the tourists and reporters out.

"There are always people walking up to the prison," said Francisco Figueroa, lead guitarist of the jail band called Pitahaya Flower. "So many reporters from Mexico and the U.S. I don't give pictures anymore. People are walking in on my family. I have to get locks and keep them out."

"Uno, dos, tres, cuatro! Hang on Sloopy hang on," Figueroa sang as 200 local teen-agers moved onto the dance floor at the Delegacion Polia. In their platform shoes, white flared pants and "day-glo" print rayon shirts, they boogied just like their counterparts 400 miles to the north. Today, with the pavement bringing regularly scheduled bus and truck runs, the newest styles appear on the shelves of the most remote village not very long after they've become popular in Tijuana or Ensenada.

The old days of Baja cannot be brought back, and more changes are on the way: 12 additional airports, 17 desalination plants for 26 proposed new cities, five new deep-water ports. The Federal government plans condominiums, marinas, ferry depots, charter boat facilities and five Holiday Inns. A land boom has driven up land prices 100 to 200 percent within the last two years.

John Steinbeck called by the capital city of La Paz, 350 miles south of Mulegé, and in 1941 he wrote of the Mediterranean-style port city in "The Log from the Sea of Cortez": "On the water's edge of La Paz, a new hotel was going up, and it looked very expensive. Probably the airplanes will bring in weekenders from Los Angeles before long, and the beautiful poor bedraggled old town will bloom with a ugliness."

La Paz has some new traffic these days on the malecon (water drive) brought about by the big campers, and a hotel vacation little bit harder to find. But a can still spend an afternoon Perla, a European-style sidewalk with waiters in white shirts and tie, and watch the sun set over the bay. La Paz is still a city of its own residents first and a vacation second. There are no high-rise lining the beachfront, stretching the mark by about 150 miles. Beach West is Cabo San Lucas.

Developers looking to lure the fishing enthusiasts from the chose the tip of the peninsula. Fly-in mid-winter luxury runs. About 75 miles south of La Paz terrain and feeling becomes a cal. The road turns inland.

"The desert Bajaenos were like the homesteaders who tamed the American frontier: The land was theirs because they stopped there first. Free roaming herds of wild mustangs and burros were common."

flour in front of their machines for 15 or so minutes. Those who made it would pull up to Grosso's rancho with dirt in nose, eyes, ears, mouth, suits. At the end of the silt beds was a grizzly, graying Arturo Grosso, with a perennial three-day growth of beard, would offer the severely beaten-up driver a right hand as rough as a turtle's paw, and a beer.

Since moving a mile west to the pavement, Grosso has gone through a change of image. There is a new sign up the road—a pastel-green cactus, hand-lettered "Nueva Rancho Chapala"—designed to catch the attention of the fast-moving tourists. Grosso has also decided to upgrade his facilities and has imported walnut veneer wall-board for the cafe.

"Jeeeeeesez Chreeeeest!!!" screamed Grosso (who begins every sentence with the same epithet) "this lumber is muy caro. Do you know how mucho this is? It is 24-pesos a one. Twenty-four! Crazy!"

Signs up and down the peninsula on Mexican Highway 1 warn tourists could fix anything that ran. All cars that come into town he would make work again. Wire, string. It is called "Mexicanize," to make work." He laughed.

Frank Fischer, who made the transition from deserter to city father and legendary master mechanic of Baja, never lived to see Mexican Highway 1 come through San Ignacio. His son feels he didn't miss much.

"Our motel is empty now. The Americans coming in from the desert country to the north do not stop here at La Posada. Since they have built El Presidente here outside the town, near the springs in the date groves, they stay there," he said.

Many of the tourists who no longer stop are anxious to reach the much talked about bay—Bahía de Concepcion—about 70 miles south and east of San Ignacio. The pre-pavement drivers would eat the dirt of the Vizcaino desert for several days to lie on the unmarked, virtually deserted white sand beaches—25 miles of coves and lagoons of string. The knots are complicated, masterful and many, and at the completion of each one they grin at me and say, "Endox?" and I say, "Bravo." We have become companions in a worthy adventure.

Encounter: Mission Impossible

I adore them. I pay. They adore me. Do I want a taxi? We shake hands all around and go on a small safari across two lanes of traffic, heads down against the wind. In the middle of the street they tell me it's a bad day to get a taxi because the buses are all on strike. Also it is almost Messy Mary. Messy Mary is midway when nearly everyone closes up shop and goes home to lunch. It lasts till 4 P.M.

After half an hour of dramatic effort we flag down a cab, but the driver says, "OCHI" (No. 2) when he hears that I want to go to the Post-Office-for-Parcels near Syntagma Square. While I nevertheless climb in front, one pirate stows my parcels, the other engages in a yelling match with the driver who clearly feels that this trip is either too short or too long or both. And we're off to Syntagma.

There are three speeds in Athens: stop, dizzying and breakneck. My driver, who has an alarming moustache and more alarming eyes, knows the trick: one foot on the brake and the other flooring the accelerator. In no time we are at the door of the wrong post office. He points, "Post Office." "No, not that one. That one is for letters only. I wish to go to the Post-Office-for-Parcels." I have been there. It is only just over there on the other side of the square, behind some buildings, inside a long arcade, on a street whose name, in my excitement, I do not remember.

"That is the Post Office," says my driver.

"I know there's another." I am screaming. We are dashing once and yet again around the square.

"Ochi."

"Noy." ("Yes.")

"Ochi."

"Noy. Noy."

He hurtles off at an angle, and we cover untold blocks of one-way streets at dizzying, I say, like a runaway horse, he with both hands off the wheel and his chin to the sky, showing me that there is not, positively OCHI another post office. I implore him to ask someone but he does not.

Finally he brings the cab to a lurching halt at the curb. "You see, there is no other post office, my child," he says. ("My child" can be a most demeaning form of address.) "You must get out here."

I look out of the cab window and am mystified, for there, 30 yards away in a courtyard behind a long arcade, is the blue-and-white Greek flag and the yellow sign of the Post-Office-for-Parcels. I point it out to him; he shrugs. His eyes have an unabashed gleam of triumph at having fooled me. "I did not know where it was," he says.

But I, too, have my triumph, the words in Greek coming to me with an inspiration born of rage. "You did not ask someone. You have a tongue, my child." Unbelievably, he is impressed. "I have," he says, and unloads my parcels for me. I conclude that he has been putting me on; perhaps as a repayment for violating his ochi in the first place. Perhaps for presuming to know more than he did. Not, surely, to boost the fare.

As I pay his eyes seem to say, "Forgive me and think it was just a little bit funny." And mine say, "I do. Or at least I will."

But I am still 30 yards from the post office and the boxes are big and I don't lose sight of them. So in the manner of a nervous squirrel taking two nuts to the nest I must carry one 20 feet, go back for the other and so on, all under the impervious stares of several shopkeepers standing in their doorways.

Inside the post office two men are struggling to put an enormous foam rubber mattress into a burlap bag one meter long. The mattress is fighting back.

Behind the counter is a man who looks like Apollo, but an Apollo, alas, who has missed his breakfast and moreover is considering the distinct possibility that he will miss his lunch. An Apollo who, if he knows English, does not this day waste any of it on me. He eyes the parcels with weary disdain. "What have you got in there?" he says. In Greek. "Rocks?" He goes back to his paper work. After a while he looks up, not believing I am still there.

"Those are too big," he says and looks away. I advance one pace.

"Ochi," I say, "they are one meter."

He goes away. After a while he comes back with a measuring tape. To his disgust they pass.

He says, "Well, they're too heavy then." Unassisted I hoist them to the scale which is on a high counter. They are well under the maximum for air parcels.

"They are too big," said Apollo behind the counter in the post office, eyeing the parcels with weary disdain. Then: "They're too heavy. . . They're not taped. . . It will cost too much to send by air. . ."

But Apollo holds an ace. He looks with loathing at the fine packing job of the pirates and says, "These aren't taped. You have to have new tape all around."

"Where do I get the tape?" I ask for the moment bested.

"Do I know? Syntagma Square. Ommonia Square. Ommonia Square is 12 blocks away. You will find it."

A man at the counter says, "You must hurry. The shop will close."

But it isn't closed, it is just hard to find. Fifteen frantic minutes later I limp into the stationery store on Hermes Street just at the fashionable moment when all of Athens is buying its tape supply for the year. I have to wait in line for half an hour.

Back at the post office, when I arrive with my huge roll of snow white tape, the two men are still struggling with the mattress.

"I don't believe it," I say.

They look at me and grin. One of them says, "It isn't easy, sending parcels."

It isn't easy doing the taping, but at last I am ready for the official weighing. Apollo makes the clicking noise conveying doubt that I know enough to read.

"You want to send them by ship?"

he says. "They are heavy, be expensive."

"No," I quail, "by air."

"By AIR! It will cost you by air. You better send them by air. My Greek is not up to why they must go by air, but two of Apollo's colleagues, by the sound of a possibly mispronounced word, come in from a back street. They tell me that I had better by ship because air would be great deal, much more than I have. I start counting on as they crowd around.

"She has it," says one of me.

"She doesn't have it," says scornfully. They bet. I am not. They do not accept travel, and I say I will have to go bank. They assure me the parcels once more and stare through the arcade. They are way of knowing that I am to throw myself under a bus, I throw myself under a bus, I buses are on strike. On my see someone coming out of . . . AND SOMEONE GOING IN. . . As I return through the arcade more, my purse, new-stuffed drachmas, Achilles, who is standing in front of his travel each time I have gone through, hold out my tongue.

"Can I help you?" he asks.

"No, thank you." I am radiant just going to the Post-Office-for-Parcels.

"I am afraid you will find the post office is closed," he says. But by now I am far too wise to heed him.

Back in the post office, as our forms in quadruplicate under lo's stern eye, a band of roving Americans appears. They are chanted to find that I have "far out," they breathe. "Outta" and get to work taping like of wrapping Christmas presents. Who's got the tape? They are piling their old jeans, their things to send home for Me wash while they go on trudge world. They are going to Kabul, aistan, by thumb. They are going Nepal by bus. To the border, by yak? They are glib and funny, and they make me like Alice-sit-by-the-fire.

At last all is ended. My taped and portly, repose in a going pile. I hand over, vased Apollo shakes his head. "Marry mas," he says, and I sense a price of tin olive oil pithers for a swift rise.

"Then berazzy," I tell him, aren't my drachmas. We regar other with the mutual respect of and new mother after a six delivery. On an impulse I sh hand and say:

"Goodbye, Apollo."

His sudden smile flashes, as his eyes.

As I head back past the Post Building, the white-shirted guards are looking cold down in pom-pommed shoes, and in the Royal Gardens Hall file mills in a gale. I realize that far too late for lunch. I also that I tingle pleasantly and longer cold in spite of the wind had switched around and is now from the north off the first on Mount Olympus. It seems it distant laughter that I cannot join.

People like it for what it's not.

It's not "touristy." Almost any Caribbean vacation spot can offer you a few secluded beaches. La República Dominicana has 270 miles of them—some stretches so inviolate that you can shed your swimsuit along with your city-bred uptightness.

La República Dominicana is a country in the building. But it's not all built up. At least, not yet.

It does boast some of the newest hotels in the Caribbean. And some of the best restaurants. And an international airport that's only 3½ hours from New York. And a fiendishly tricky Pete Dye golf course that's most often compared to Pebble Beach. And splashes of native son Oscar de la Renta's colorful decor almost everywhere.

With all of this, it's not over-priced. You can still get a first-class hotel room for $12 a day. Or drive into the countryside and buy a pineapple for 25 cents... a freshly picked avocado for a dime.

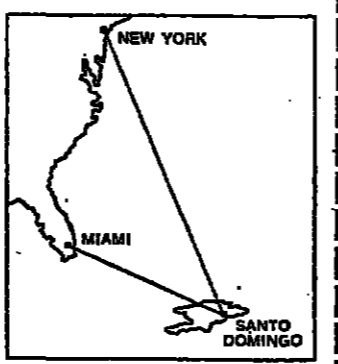

Above all, La República Dominicana is not hostile. It's a country at peace with itself. And the people have been unaffected by visitors and high pressure tourism.

It is, quite frankly, a little behind the times. All of its beauties have not yet blossomed. The Jet Set hasn't discovered it yet. Not quite yet. So it's not the Caribbean country for everybody.

LATOC

The Caribbean vacation that begins with a private limousine at your door

And that's just the beginning. The people who created Sandy Lane have done it again. They outdid themselves in creating La Toc, the 100-acre luxury resort on undiscovered St. Lucia.

Your first taste of La Toc style begins at your own doorstep (if you live within 60 miles of JFK) as the chauffeur hands you into your private limousine for the ride to the airport. That should give you an idea of what to expect from La Toc.

You'll swim in a pool so large, it has its own island. Or laze on half a mile of crescent beach. There's a private 9-hole golf course. Lighted tennis courts. A British-trained staff. A French-run kitchen. And nightly entertainment.

One week, $660 to $690, including round-trip air fare on direct BWIA flights, limousine to and from JFK, transfers in St. Lucia, balconied room with ocean view and all breakfasts and dinners at La Toc. Private villas, $560 to $590 (meals extra). Rates per person, double occupancy, plus taxes and service charges. Longer stays available.

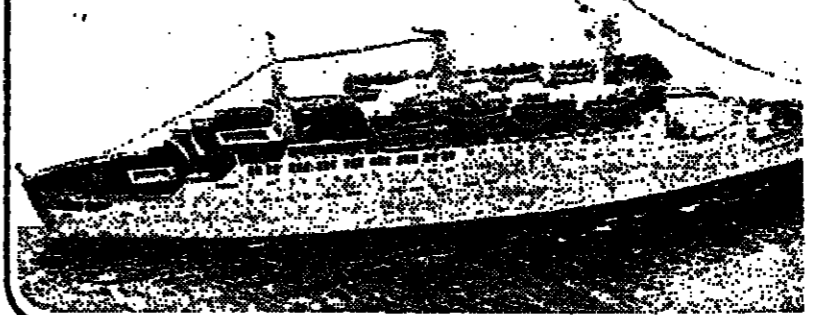

Early reservations essential. See your travel agent. Or call Mr. Vaughn Rickard at (212) 983-2510. Or write Cunard Resorts, Dept. W, 555 Fifth Ave., N.Y., N.Y. 10017 for brochure.

The Maya/Palenque Cruise. March 30. 14 days and 8 ports. Haiti, Cartagena, Roatan. And five uncommon ports that will lead you to the mysteries of the ancient Mayan civilization—Santo Tomas de Castilla, Belize, Playa del Carmen, Cozumel and Coatzacoalcos.

The Trans-Panama Cruise. Los Angeles. April 13. 18 days and 9 ports. St. Thomas, Guadeloupe, Bonaire, Curacao, Cartagena, Cristobal, Balboa, Acapulco, Acapulco.

All three cruises begin in Everglades, Florida. And you'll be sailing in the graceful world of M. S. Renaissance all the way.

No. 2580 Takes the Throttle

though we never hit our top speed of 18 miles an hour.

Suddenly, Unterwieser began to shout. I had been daydreaming and missed making a whistle signal.

Stopping again at St. Lorenzen ob Murau, two stations from home, I braked too abruptly and stopped 50 feet short of the waiting stationmaster.

"Oh, too soon," said Unterwieser. "You could have saved him a walk." The trainman was unperturbed, however, and strolled over to meet us. "Isn't this the prettiest station in the valley?" he said, proud of his scarlet begonias and yellow studentenblumen.

Tooting merrily, we coasted back to Murau where I was handed my official engineer's certificate and examined the other locomotives in the elaborate railroad workshop.

Except for some minor differences, the somewhat larger U-40 and U-43 operate very much like the Stainz. Unlike the Stainz, however, they do not have the floor panel security brake. Also, their three axles gives them a somewhat smoother ride than the Stainz provides.

The Stainz costs 550 Austrian Schillings an hour, somewhat over $30 at the current rate. The U-40 and U-43 each run 900 Schillings or about $60. Insurance costs another $1.50. In addition, all passengers carried along pay regular fares, about $3, for example, for a 90-minute journey along a main stretch between Murau and Tamsweg.

A visiting group carrying along its own food and picnicking in the buffet wagon pays an additional charge of about $12 for clean-up costs. If a concessionaire provides the food, however, he takes care of the clean-up and the group is not charged. According to assistant director, Grafinger, the rental tariffs are not designed to produce a profit for the railroad but only to cover its costs.

In Murau a medieval flavor clings to the narrow streets winding up to the Mattheus church, first dedicated in 1256 and above it, the Baroque castle of the Von Schwarzenberg family which built it 1626 and still occupies it. Wolfgang Wisland, caretaker and historian to the family, may be contacted for an absorbing account of the family's rise from the marriage in 1617 of the 30-year old Georg Ludwig von Schwarzenberg to the five-times-named, 80-year-old Anna Neumann-Lichtenstain.

The center of Murau is still a stronghold place, now called the Schloßplatz, designed by Otto von Liechtenstein in the late 16th century, a still graced with centuries-old blue and gray and pink plaster-and-beam buildings. The onion-domed Rathaus, which dates to 1530 when it was a watchtower in the city wall, has Roman masonry artifacts plastered into its outside wall and across the street an unusually well stocked local museum. (with sums) Visiting hours limited to Thursdays on Fridays at 4 P.M. displays ancient peasant implements and a pair of 2,000-year-old linen shirts. (Open in winter appointment with the caretaker.)

Murau has about 70 hotels, guest houses and a youth hostel, with rates from about $15 for a double room with breakfast to less than $3 a single room in the hotel. There are a half-dozen adequate if undistinguished German style restaurants.

There are two tennis courts available for about $2.50 an hour with two courts in the building stage, an indoor pool with an admission price of about $1.50 and countless free hiking trails meandering through the forested hills surrounding the town.

Murau is also seeking to develop its potential as a ski resort; over $2 million was spent recently for eight new ski lifts that are scheduled to be operational this winter. However, the Muraubahn will undoubtedly remain the leading attraction for some time to come. The town itself has done little tourist advertising, but that is probably coming. Posted on the railroad station during my visit was a notice offering at about $5 each, Muraubahn calendar and Muraubahn tee-shirts with blue and green and orange pictures of the U-40 and U-43.

to Murau to rent the Muraubahn, it is strongly advised that you write the assistant director, Harold Grafinger, with as much advance notice as possible. The best way to get to Murau without a car is by train from Vienna. The train to Unzmarkt takes about three hours and from there it's about a one-hour ride either by the Muraubahn or post-bus to Murau.

The trip from Salzburg is easy by car and takes only a few hours, but it is difficult by public transportation because schedules mesh poorly. You take the train from Salzburg to Radstadt, switch there to a post-bus for Tamsweg, then pick up another bus or the Muraubahn train to Murau. It can take the better part of a day.

Murau has a municipal tourist office—the Verkehrsverein Murau at the Rathaus (tel.: 03532-2720). There is also a municipal travel office at the train station. The number of the Muraubahn office is 03532-2231.—R. R.

LAKER'S LONDON. IT'S MORE BEAUTIFUL BECAUSE IT'S LONDON WITH MORE MONEY IN YOUR POCKET.

Beginning April 2, a remarkable British airline starts twice-weekly DC-10 flights between New York and London.

An airline already flown by millions of travelers in England and Europe alone. The airline is Laker Airways. The man behind it is Freddie Laker. Laker is an outspoken man, with strong opinions about what an airline should be and shouldn't be.

One of the things it shouldn't be, is expensive. Freddie Laker thinks it's outrageous what you've had to pay on high-priced airlines.

On Laker, you can save from 10% to 50% off regular economy fares. Without gimmicks. And with only one price for each season, regardless of how long you stay.

To take a Laker to London, you buy your ticket 65 days ahead of time, and plan to stay at least 10 days abroad.

Which means, by buying your ticket through any good travel agent, you can fly roundtrip to London from New York in April and May for as little as $279. We repeat: $279.

(Note: This minimum airfare is for a full flight and already includes a $70 service charge. If all seats aren't sold, the price may be increased up to 20%, to a maximum of $334.80, never any higher. But that's rare, and still lots less than flying regular economy. If the price increased more than 20%, the flight would be cancelled at least 45 days before departure and you'd receive a full refund.)

So now, you can spend less money in the air. And more on the ground.

You don't have to be a member of any club or association to fly Laker.

You just have to be yourself. So if you've been thinking about flying to London, it's now a lot cheaper. And a lot easier.

All you have to do is see a good travel agent, or send us the coupon on this page.

And then you'll agree: Laker's London is more beautiful. Because it's London with more money in your pocket.

WHEN YOUR TRAVEL AGENT RECOMMENDS A CRUISE, TAKE IT. EVEN IF IT ISN'T OURS.

Choosing a cruise can be a gamble. There are just too many cruise lines, too many cruises, and too many ads describing the splendor of each cruise line's ships. But there is someone to turn to who knows which cruise line and which cruises offer the best ships, the most ports... and the best values. It's your travel agent. It's his business to know cruise lines. In fact, professional travel agents often take cruises themselves just so they can give you advice based on personal experience. WHAT TO ASK YOUR TRAVEL AGENT. Start by asking about the advantages of a larger, more spacious ship. Then ask which crew nationality offers the most personal and attentive service.

Ask about the excellence of the cuisine. Are the chefs employed by a catering service, or retained by the cruise line? How do the cabins size up? How many pubs, public rooms, swimming pools are available? Ask about the ports of call. Are they the best choice? Are you allowed adequate time ashore in those ports for sightseeing or shopping? How about the Air/Sea program available? Do they give you the reliability of a scheduled airline, stop-over privileges, and major cost savings? WHY SITMAR WANTS YOU TO KNOW ABOUT CRUISING. A cruise can be a worrisome adventure. After all, if you don't it, you wasted your time and money. Sitmar wants you to go aboard knowing as much about us as possible. That's why we want you to ask an impartial professional these important questions about cruise lines. Don't be surprised Sitmar is recommended, since a recent independent survey showed that most travel agents rate Sitmar a better value than any other cruise line. By all means get the answers, then take your travel agent's advice when a cruise is recommended. Yes, even if it isn't ours.

Do the Caribbean the French Way.

The French Caribbean

Martinique and Guadeloupe—the French Caribbean. They're Caribbean. Stretches of white sand beaches. Secluded coves. Luxuriant tropical countryside. Soft sun. Gentle, clear seas. But they're French. Beach hotels with gracious French service. Superb French cuisine and delightful Creole dishes. Vintage wines. Aperitifs at twilight. Lots of discotheques and a casino in Martinique. And a world of sports—tennis, deep sea fishing, scuba diving, water-skiing, snorkeling—at your fingertips. You'll also fly to the French Caribbean on the plane that has re-defined comfort: the new wide-bodied A300. There's a French Way to enjoy the French Caribbean to suit most moods. And most budgets. Here are a few. For further information, and tour restrictions, speak to your Travel Specialist. Or call Air France at (212) 759-9550.

Iberia, the world's most gracious airline, invites you to Spain at embarrassingly low prices.

There is a kind of graciousness that is distinctively Spanish. A generosity of spirit beneath a veneer of reserve. A curious blend of warmth and friendliness, dignity and respect. A pride in offering hospitality.

Take a MundiColor™ tour of Spain this autumn or winter. You will experience this graciousness from the moment you board your Iberia jetliner. And you will enjoy a memorable trip at prices you thought no longer existed. For example:

Island Parades Cruise, 8 days, $499—$549*

Notes About Travel

annual canoe race on the ice-bound St. Lawrence River. In this event, which is traditionally held on the last day of the Carnival, five-man crews race across the mile-wide river, hauling their 300-pound canoes over the ice floes until they reach open water again.

BETSY ROSS HUNT

A nationwide contest is being conducted to find a modern-day Betsy Ross to make a Bicentennial flag. The competition is being sponsored by the Cane Bay Plantation Hotel on St. Croix in the United States Virgin Islands, and the winner will receive a round-trip flight from Eastern Air Lines and a free one-week stay at the hotel.

The catch is that the woman who wins will have to bear the same name as the Philadelphia seamstress who stitched up America's first flag for Washington's Continental Army.

The contest should be wide open, however, says Charles Goll, the hotel's owner. He estimated that there are approximately 4,000 women in the United States today named Betsy Ross.

But can they sew?

STERNWHEELER

The new $20 million stern-wheel steamboat, the Mississippi Queen, will depart May 11 on her maiden voyage from her home port in Cincinnati to New Orleans, but already the 18-night cruise is fully booked. Latecomers applying for berths on the maiden voyage are being advised not to despair, however, for in addition to the first voyage the vessel will make four "grand inaugural cruises," three special spring and summer cruises and 21 "Old South" cruises in her premier season of plying the 3,500 miles of navigable waterways of the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers. Built as a sister ship of the 50-year-old Delta Queen, which is still going strong, the new paddlewheel is capable of carrying 500 passengers, and fares for most of the seven-night cruises range from $385 to $1,050, depending on the type of accommodations. In all, there will be 29 cruises between May and the end of the year. Unlike her sister ship, the new Mississippi Queen will be equipped with a swimming pool. She will also have a steam calliope, or "steam-pianna," as it's called on the river. For brochures write to the Delta Queen Steamboat Company, a subsidiary of Overseas National Airways, at 323 East Fourth Street, Cincinnati, Ohio 45202.

"MEET THE BRITISH"

A series of lectures, visits and informal get-togethers between American tourists and their English hosts has been instituted by Enjoy Britain and the World, Ltd., an organization dedicated to the task of bringing overseas visitors and the British into closer contact. Enjoy has joined with Friends, a club for professional people, to launch the get-togethers, most of which will take place in London, although they include dinners with families in Yorkshire.

There is a subscription fee and one pays for whatever food or drink he consumes. For details, contact: Enjoy Britain, 21 Old Brompton Road, London, SW7 (tel: 01-584-4545).

ATLANTIC CROSSING

In addition to the 26 trans-Atlantic ship crossings described in the Notes Column on Dec. 7, the Vistafjord of the Norwegian America Line is scheduled to make one crossing next May. The liner will sail from Port Everglades on May 22 and from New York on May 25. She will call at Kristiansand, Norway, on June 2, at Hamburg on June 4 and at Tilbury, England, on June 6. The voyage will be a single-class sailing, with prices from New York to Kristiansand starting at $520. Further details may be obtained from Norwegian America Line, 29 Broadway, New York 10006 (tel: 212-463900).
